* The REBELLION is considered as beginning Jan. 9, 1861, when the first Rebel shot was fired into the Star of the West, bearing the United States flag, and terminating Aug. 12, 1866, the date of the President's final proclamation that all hostilities had ceased.

This LIST embraces only the principal engagements of the Rebellion, the many thousands of skirmishes and minor actions being omitted. Though much care has been bestowed upon its preparation, it is by no means perfect, for want of reliable information, which does not exist in published works, nor do the records of the War Department give full and entirely satisfactory data. In the classification here adopted the term Battle is applied to prolonged contests of armies or large bodies, usually not less than an army corps; Combat, to a lesser battle, where a division at least was engaged; and Action, for the want of a better appellation, or as a substitute for Affair, used by some military writers, is here employed to designate a minor engagement between small bodies of one or a few regiments. In the summaries of services of graduates it will be found that these terms do not always correspond to the classification in this list, which has been more recently prepared, and with fuller information than was attainable when the former were written.

THE EARLY HISTORY
OF THE
UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY.

BY

BVT. MAJ.-GEN. GEORGE W. CULLUM,
COLONEL OF ENGINEERS, U. S. ARMY, RETIRED.

PREFACE.

AFTER my retirement from active service in 1874, I designed to write the history of the Military Academy, with which I was somewhat familiar from having been in 1834–36 the Assistant to the Chief Engineer, and, under his direction, in charge of Military Academy affairs; and, since that time, having had extensive correspondence with many graduates of the institution.

On undertaking my task, I was at once confronted with the certainty that little record evidence of the early history of the Military Academy was to be found in the public archives at Washington or West Point, the "Old Provost" at the latter place having been burned in 1795, and the War Department records, at the former, in the conflagration of November 8, 1800. Further, some important papers were lost when the British captured Washington in 1814, and finally came the destruction, February 19, 1838, of the Academic building at West Point, leaving not a vestige of the accumulated records of the post, and of the Academy since its establishment.

As little or nothing remained in official repositories to guide me in my proposed work, I sought for information from the surviving son of Colonel Williams, the first Superintendent of the Military Academy, who made me his guest for many weeks, and gave me free access to all of his father's well-preserved official and private papers. From this rich mine, aided by information derived from the elder living graduates, I was enabled to write, in 1874, the following history of the Academy during the period from 1802 to 1812.

In 1883 I delivered an address upon the unveiling of the statue of General Thayer at West Point. This address gives the essential facts connected with the recreation of the institution, and its able administration under the "Father of the Academy," from 1817 to 1833.

To supply the gap from 1812 to 1817, I have brought together such items of the history of that dark age of the institution as could be supplied by my very copious notes of the past half century, and extensive correspondence with those who were Cadets during that chaotic period.

Though imperfect and incomplete, I have appended this Early History of the Military Academy to the Biographical Register of its Officers and Graduates, hoping thereby to rescue from oblivion much of interest to the élèves of their far-famed Alma Mater.

INTRODUCTION.

MILITARY EDUCATION in schools or in the field has been deemed essential to the success of arms in all civilized nations from the days of the early Greeks to this last decade of the nineteenth century. No truth is better supported by history than that victory, cæteris paribus, will perch upon the standards of those armies having the best instructed and most experienced officers. Education in the field being a luxury too expensive in blood and treasure for the safe reliance of a nation, military schools were long since established in all the countries of Europe, and the dear-bought experience of our Revolution proved the indispensable necessity of one in the United States; yet we were slow to secure this great boon for our military service.

The Continental Congress, as early as September 20, 1776, appointed a committee of three of its members to inquire into the state of the Army and the best means of supplying its wants. In its report of October 3, 1776, after pointing out many deficiencies, particularly "that some of the troops in camp were badly officered, and not subject to the command which good troops ought ever to be," the committee recommended: "That the Board of War be directed to prepare a Continental Laboratory, and a MILITARY ACADEMY, and provide the same with proper officers." This resolution was doubtless induced by General Knox's "Hints for the Improvement of the Artillery of the United States," given to the committee September 27, 1776, in which he states that, "as officers can never act with confidence until they are masters of their profession, an Academy established on a liberal plan would be of the utmost service to the Continent, where the whole theory and practice of fortification and gunnery should be taught."

The Continental Congress, impatient for action, before its committee had reported, resolved, October 1, 1776: "That a committee of five be appointed to prepare and bring in a plan of a Military Academy at the Army." This committee, composed of distinguished members, among them John Adams, does not appear, so far as the published "American Archives" show, to have ever reported, and there is nothing to prove that Congress took any further steps to secure military education till after the end of the Revolution, although Washington, during that prolonged contest, never ceased to call the attention of Congress to the absolute necessity of a systematic organization of the Army, and of competent officers to direct its movements. We all know how much our cause suffered from charlatans with a modicum of scientific knowledge, and from adventurers, professing to have been educated in foreign military schools, who were often commissioned with high rank in the Continental Army.

From the termination of the War of Independence in 1783 to the end of his life in 1799, Washington, in his official messages and letters, never ceased to urge upon his countrymen the importance of military instruction for the security of the nation. Though he did not live to see his wise counsels fully carried out, his earnest efforts, and those of other veterans of the Revolution, had brought the subject to the serious attention of Congress and the people.

James McHenry, the enlightened head of the War

Department, who had seen service in the Revolution, made, January 5, 1800, a report to the President, John Adams, which he communicated on the 13th to Congress, as containing "various matters in which the honor and safety of the nation are deeply interested."

"No sentiment," says the Secretary, "is more just than this, that, in proportion as the circumstances and policy of a people are opposed to the maintenance of a large military force, it is important that as much perfection as possible be given to that which at any time may exist.

"It is not, however, enough that the troops it may deem proper to maintain be rendered as perfect as possible in form, organization, and discipline: the dignity, the character to be supported, and the safety of the country, further require that it should have military institutions; should be capable of perpetuating the art of war, and of furnishing the means of forming a new and enlarged army, fit for service, in the shortest time possible, and at the least practicable expense to the state.

"Let it not be presumed that a country, however distantly situated from other nations, or favored by the courage and genius of its inhabitants, can neglect with impunity military institutions, or that it may safely consider all regular force to be useless, except when there is an enemy present to employ it. A country which acts upon such a maxim will invariably attract injuries and enemies, and, sooner or later, sink by internal discords, or see its noble spirit broke down by repeated humiliations, and the whole people thus prepared for the last stage of national degradation.

"If a farmer would secure his flocks, he must go to the expense of shepherds; if preserve his crops, he must enclose his fields. In like manner, to ensure safety to the nation, it is necessary that the leading avenues into it be guarded by troops and fortifications. . . . Are we without regular troops, we may soon lose the military art; are we without engineers, not a little of the money employed on fortifications will be always hazarded, if not actually thrown away, and generals of the most consummate genius forced to capitulate in the field, where retreat might have been covered by a fortification, or the battle decided in their favor by a happily contrived intrenchment.

“ Since, however, it seems to be agreed that we are not to keep on foot numerous forces, and it would be impossible on a sudden to extend to every essential point our fortifications, military science, in its various branches, ought to be cultivated with peculiar care in proper nurseries; so that a sufficient stock may always exist, ready to be imparted and diffused to any extent to additional troops which events may successively require to be raised. This will be to substitute the elements of an army to the thing itself, and will greatly tend to enable the Government to dispense with a large body of standing forces, from the facility which it will give of procuring officers, and forming soldiers promptly in all emergencies.

“ No sound mind, after a fair view of the subject, can doubt the essentiality of military science in time of war, any more than the moral certainty that the most pacific policy on the part of the Government, and the most solemn and well-observed treaties, will not preserve a country from being engaged in war more or less frequently. To avoid great evils, we must either have a respectable force always ready for service, or the means of preparing such a force with certainty and expedition. The latter, as most agreeable to the genius of our government and nation, is the object of the following proposition:—

“ 1st. A Military Academy.

“ This object has repeatedly engaged the favourable attention of the Legislature, and some laws towards its consummation have been passed [Acts of May 9, 1774, April 27, 1798, March 3, 1799, and May 14, 1800, attaching Cadets to regiments]. These, however, being yet inadequate to afford the requisite instruction to officers and others in ‘the principles of war, the exercises it requires, and the sciences upon which they are founded,’ the adoption of a more perfect plan is conceived to be indispensable for those purposes. With this view, the following plan is respectfully suggested, formed upon those of institutions of a similar nature, from which the nations who have founded them derive the most decided advantages.

“ It is proposed that this Academy shall consist of four schools, — one, to be called ‘The Fundamental School;’ another, ‘The School of Engineers and Artillerists;’ another, ‘The School of Cavalry and Infantry;’ and a fourth, ‘The School of the Navy,’ — and be provided with the following officers, professors, and teachers,” — which it is unnecessary here to enumerate.

In a subsequent report, made January 31, 1800, he again dwells upon the vast importance of military instruction for the security of the nation, and submits estimates of the cost of his proposed Military Academy.

These reports were referred to a committee of seven members of the House of Representatives, by whom a bill was submitted, which, unfortunately, was not acted upon during the session.

In the following session of Congress, by a resolution of December 22, 1801, the Secretary of War was called upon for a statement of the existing military establishment, with which he complied on the 24th. From the deliberations of Congress upon these various reports emanated the law of March 16, 1802, creating the United States Military Academy, which has since produced so many distinguished scholars and soldiers.

Since the establishment of the institution it has shown its inestimable value in three great wars, and in the perpetual struggle with Indian savages till the frontier has ceased to exist, and the whole land, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, has become the safe abode of its many millions of unmolested people.

I cannot better conclude this brief Introduction than by a quotation from Secretary James G. Blaine's "Twenty Years of Congress : " —

"The value of strict military training was shown [during the Rebellion of the Seceding States] by the superior prominence attained in proportion to their numbers by the officers who had been educated at the West Point Military Academy. The wisdom of maintaining that institution was abundantly vindicated by the results of the war. Its graduates worked in harmony with the volunteers, and, as a matter of fact, the field offices they held during the war were, with few exceptions, under the law for the organization of the volunteer forces. They imparted to the entire Army the discipline, the organization, and the efficiency of a regular military establishment. There was naturally at the beginning of the war a certain jealousy between the regulars and the volunteers, but none that did not yield to the patriotism and good sense of both. The two services were rapidly and most happily combined, and demonstrated by their joint prowess the strength of the country for defense, and, if need be, for offense."

EARLY HISTORY

OF THE

UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY.

CHAPTER I.

PERIOD FROM MARCH 16, 1802, TO JULY 31, 1812.

COLONEL JONATHAN WILLIAMS, SUPERINTENDENT.¹

IN the preceding Introduction we have seen that, from the earliest ages, all civilized nations have deemed Military Education to be essential to the well-being of their armies; that, during our Revolutionary struggle, we purchased experience by bloody disaster, or discounted it by conferring high rank upon foreign talent; that the "Father of his Country," and his most enlightened generals, earnestly urged the necessity of preparations in peace for the contingencies of war; that the patriot statesmen and virtuous sages of our infant republic recognized the importance of trained officers for elevated command; and that, though legislation had provided a Military School in 1798, there were no adequate means for its efficient organization.

Congress, at last, plucked the flower of safety from these nettles of danger by the enactment of the law of March 16, 1802, creating a Corps of Engineers which "shall constitute a Military Academy." It was provided by that law:—

"SEC. 26. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered, when he shall deem it expedient, to organize and establish a Corps of Engineers, to consist of one engineer, with the pay, rank, and emoluments of a major; two assistant engineers, with the pay, rank, and emoluments of captains; two other assistant engineers, with the pay, rank, and emoluments of first lieutenants; two other assistant engineers, with the pay, rank, and emoluments of second lieutenants; and ten cadets, with the pay of sixteen dollars per month, and two rations per day; and the President of the United States is in like manner authorized, when he shall deem it proper, to make such promotions in the said corps, with a view to particular merit, and without regard to rank, so as not to exceed one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, two majors, four captains, four first lieutenants, four second lieutenants, and so as that the number of the whole corps shall at no time exceed twenty officers and cadets.

"SEC. 27. That the said corps, when so organized, shall be stationed at West Point, in the State of New York, and shall constitute a Military Academy; and the engineers, assistant engineers, and cadets of the said corps shall be subject at all times to do duty in such places and on such service as the President of the United States shall direct.

"SEC. 28. That the principal engineer, and in his absence the next in rank, shall have the Superintendence of the said Military Academy, under the direction of the President of the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, at the public expense, under such regulations as shall be directed by the President of the United States, to procure the necessary books, implements, and apparatus for the use and benefit of the said institution."

By other sections of the law, forty cadets of artillery were authorized to draw the pay of ten dollars per month, with two rations per day.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, who filled the Presidential chair, approved this law, though he alone of Washington's cabinet had doubted, in 1793, the constitutionality of a Military Academy. This founder of the new institution, of which Washington was the originator, was one of the bright stars in our Revolutionary galaxy, an acknowledged leader among eminent statesmen, a profound student of organizations which build up nations, a zealous cultivator of science and literature, and the strenuous advocate of education in his native State, to which, in his old age, he gave the University of Virginia.

HENRY DEARBORN, the Secretary of War, had been a Representative in Congress during four years of Washington's administration, when Military Education was much discussed; besides having studied war as a Revolutionary veteran in the field, in almost every campaign from Lexington to Yorktown. Possessing excellent sense, he knew our deficiencies, and the necessity for instructed soldiers to conduct strategic operations.

JONATHAN WILLIAMS, the first Superintendent of the Military Academy, is so identified with its early struggles, and by his noble character so fashioned its future, that we must enter somewhat into the details of his biography.

He was born May 26, 1750, in Boston, Mass. His father, of the same name, was a much respected merchant, largely engaged in the West India trade; was a staunch Whig, and among the foremost patriots who took part in the struggle of the colonists against the mother country; was Moderator in 1773 of the memorable meetings at Faneuil Hall to forbid the landing of the tea subsequently thrown into the harbor; and, in 1775, became a fugitive from Boston, then occupied by British troops, who burnt his store and seized all his property. His mother, Grace Williams (née Harris), a lady of good abilities and cultivated tastes, was the niece of the celebrated Dr. Benjamin Franklin.

Young Williams received a good English education, but before it was completed he was placed in his father's counting-house, to be brought up as a merchant. He was an intelligent and studious boy, devoting all his leisure to the acquirement of knowledge, obtaining in this way a considerable proficiency in the classics, and a ready and familiar acquaintance with the French language, without even a master, his father refusing him one because of his dislike to French principles. Williams's letters from the West Indies, and many parts of Europe where he traveled, display his maturity of judgment, excellent business faculties, and clear conceptions of men and things.

He went to England in 1770, taking up his residence with his grand-uncle, Dr. Franklin, to whom he made himself very useful by putting his accounts in complete order, — a labor so highly appreciated by Franklin that he presented to Williams a handsome gold watch, upon receiving which he remarked that he would much prefer the Doctor's old one, which was given to him, and is now a family heirloom. Ever after he was a great favorite of his grand-uncle.

He returned to Boston in 1771, where he was engaged for three years in mercantile pursuits. Just after the famous Boston "Tea-party" of Dec. 16, 1773, he again went to England, and probably carried the first account of this bold proceeding, as will appear from the following letter to his father: "After seeing my merchants, I went to see the Doctor [Franklin], whom I found in exceeding good health and spirits, and was welcomed by him with a degree of joy and affection which surpassed even the expectations I had formed from the former proofs I received of extensive goodness and friendship. I waited again on my uncle, but he was not at home, — went then to Lord Dartmouth's [Colonial Secretary], at whose house I met my uncle. After sending my name and business, I was immediately admitted to his lordship, who received me with great politeness. When he had read the letters, he asked me many questions, which I answered as well as I was able. I told him of the opinion of the people, their firmness, their determination, and their intention of a junction of the colonies, which I delivered perhaps not in polite but in American language. I left out nothing which I thought would give his lordship a true idea of the importance and virtue of the Americans, and having the strictest truth for my guide, I was not in the least confused nor abashed, but spoke as I would to any other man. He heard me with great politeness, and although I frequently discovered a sense of the impropriety of the administration, he seemed pleased. He then asked me my private opinion. 'Mr. Williams,' said he, 'I wish to come at truth, and as a man alone shall be glad of your sentiments with regard to the disposition of the Americans. I ask it as a private gentleman; this conversation is confidential; and you may depend I shall make no public use of what you tell me.' I made some little apology for my inferiority in point of abilities, but said that, as he had assured me we were private gentlemen, I would relate to him all I knew; but being unused to elegant addresses, I should presume on his indulgence, and deliver my sentiments in my own unadorned way, and endeavor to utter simple truths, without confounding the matter by seeking to establish the reasons. I then told him that the Americans never would submit; that they would not be surprised when the other acts should arrive; that they expected the worst, and were accordingly prepared; that I believed the junction would take place, and that they thought now or never was the time; that they supposed by submission they would make themselves the most abject slaves on earth, and that by opposition they could not be worse; that Parliament had no right to tax them, and that they would die by this opinion; and that a universal non-exportation agreement would be attended with salutary effects. His lordship, after some time, asked me if I knew ‘Mr. Williams, who appears as Moderator of that assembly [the meeting at Faneuil Hall].’ ‘He is my father, my lord.’ ‘And is your father a principal in those disturbances? Mr. Williams, how comes that, sir?’ ‘My father, my lord, is an honest man, and one who seeks not fame. He was in that meeting as any other man might be, and when chosen was much surprised; he expressed himself as being unacquainted with the office; and on the motion being put, and passed in the negative, he therefore officiated. My father, my lord, has been so little, heretofore, engaged in political disputes, that I was as much surprised as I should be had your lordship been in the dock. But, my lord, I am only relating facts; it is not for me to dispute on the merit or demerit of my father’s conduct, but I am sure he acted according to the dictates of his conscience, and upon honest principles; and thus acting, I hope your lordship will not think him wrong, though you may not agree in sentiment.’ He smiled, and, after paying me a compliment for my plainness and freedom, said laughingly, ‘So, then, your father may say with Falstaff, "Some men are in pursuit of honors, but others have honors in pursuit of them." " " "

He writes again, in September, 1774, that he anticipates warm work in Parliament, and that greater opposition than expected will be encountered in the minority; but our unanimity and firmness must eventually gain the point.

After a short visit to France, he writes, May 5, 1775, from London, almost prophetically. He says: "I have passed two months in the most agreeable manner possible, except with regard to my reflections relative to my unhappy country, which always attack me wherever I go. . . . The French are all in our favor. They suppose England to have arrived at its pinnacle of glory, and that the Empire of America will rise on the ruins of this kingdom; and I really believe that, when we shall be involved in civil war, they will gladly embrace the first opportunity of renewing their attacks on an old enemy, who they imagine will be so weakened by its internal broils as to become an easy conquest. Although I profess myself an American, I am still an Englishman; I only wish the titles to be synonymous, and therefore do not hope for the destruction of this country; I only wish the prosperity of my own, and that its rights and privileges may ever remain inviolate, to secure which no sacrifice should be thought too dear; so I do not give the French so much credit for their partiality, for I believe it to proceed in general more from a hatred to England than a love to us, though in some particulars I believe the natural rights of humanity are the basis of their opinions."

Full of youthful hope that our differences with the mother country would yet be reconciled, he had nearly completed a mercantile connection with a large English house extensively engaged in the West India trade, when the inevitable separation of the two countries decided him to quit England and reside in France. Writing from Nantes, Feb. 11, 1777, he says: "When I wrote to you from England I was in the expectation of taking up my residence in that country. The scene is now changed; and since it becomes a question which of the two countries I would prefer in a separate state, I did not hesitate to quit all my lucrative views, and to come hither to do all the service I can, without expectation of further emolument than a subsistence. It is not improbable that I shall engage in the American trade in some part of France, or return to some part of America, charged with the management of commercial matters. Whatever I do in this way will be upon a large scale, and whilst I am doing effective service to my country I may advance my own fortune. In this, however, I make a distinction: whatever I am capable of doing for the benefit of the cause, I will undertake with pleasure, gratis; but otherwise in all commercial engagements with individuals of another nation."

These letters, like which there are many others, be it remembered, were the effusions of a young man of twenty-six, yet how simply and forcibly expressed; what an exhibition of self-reliance and conscious rectitude; how full of patriotic fire and indignation against wrong; what perception of the springs of human action, and knowledge of their effects; and, grasping the significance of passing events, how prophetic of the future! His letters to Dr. Franklin, then in America, and to Robert Morris, one of his cherished correspondents, breathe a like love of country, and display a large insight into men and nations.

As a commercial agent of the United States at Nantes, though separated from the land he loved, and deeply interested in her struggle for independence, he performed with honorable fidelity his promise of gratuitously doing all in his power for the freedom of America.

He married, Sep. 12, 1779, Marianne Alexander, daughter of William Alexander of Edinburgh, in Scotland, a connection of Lord Stirling. The ceremony took place in Paris in the chapel of the Dutch ambassador, Dr. Franklin being present.

He was appointed in 1783 by the Farmers-General of France as their agent to supply them with tobacco, then a government monopoly, and this appointment took him to St. Germain-en-Laye. After two years he returned to America with Dr. Franklin, taking up his residence in Philadelphia.

During the next three years, he remained in the United States, engaged in settling and arranging his affairs, which had become involved in consequence of the war, the depreciation of the currency, and the difficulty of collecting debts. During this period of comparative leisure, he devoted himself to scientific pursuits, for which he had a great fondness; attended several courses of medical lectures; published numerous philosophical papers; received, July 18, 1787, from Harvard University, the degree of A. M.; and July 20, 1788, became member and Secretary of the American Philosophical Society, to whose transactions he contributed numerous papers.

He went to England, Nov. 30, 1789, for the last time to bring back his family to Philadelphia, which he selected as his future home to enable him to be near his earliest, kindest, and dearest friend, Dr. Franklin; but on his return, in August, 1790, he received the melancholy tidings that the great philosopher and eminent statesman was no more.

At "Mount Pleasant," his beautiful country seat on the banks of the Schuylkill, near Philadelphia (now within Fairmount Park), surrounded by his interesting family and enjoying the respect of a large social circle, he devoted his time to the duties of a useful citizen and to the pursuit of congenial studies, — mathematics, philosophy, medicine, botany, and even law, — acquiring enough of the latter to subsequently become a judge of the Court of Common Pleas in Philadelphia.

In his various voyages he had noticed that the thermometer fell when the vessel approached soundings, either over a bank or on the coast. It occurred to him that this indication would be a certain protection against shipwreck, at the trifling expense of a nautical thermometer. After repeating his experiments many times, he was satisfied that the temperature of the sea over banks was colder than the main ocean in the inverse ratio to the depth. The importance of this discovery, now established beyond controversy, he set forth before the American Philosophical Society, Nov. 19, 1790, subsequently publishing his paper in a small volume entitled "Thermometrical Navigation."

He accompanied, in 1794, the forces to quell the insurrection in Pennsylvania; and, under the act of Feb. 23, 1795, he held provisionally, from April 28 to May 23, 1800, the position of Purveyor of Public Supplies, whose duty, under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, was "to conduct the procuring and providing of all arms, military and naval stores, provisions, clothing, Indian goods, and, generally, all articles of supply requisite for the service of the United States."

President Adams appointed Williams, Feb. 16, 1801, a major in the Second Regiment of Artillerists and Engineers, and, on December 14 following, President Jefferson, under the act of March 3, 1799, commissioned him Inspector of Fortifications. In the summer of 1801, Williams made a tour of inspection along the Ohio River, from Pittsburg to Cantonment Massac (eleven miles below the mouth of the Tennessee). On Dec. 15, 1801, as previously ordered, he assumed the command of the embryo Military School at West Point which preceded the present Military Academy.

Mr. Jefferson, with John Adams and Benjamin Franklin, one of the United States Commissioners to negotiate commercial treaties with European nations, was introduced at Paris in 1784 to Williams, then an agent of the Farmers-General of France at St. Germain-en-Laye. This acquaintance ripened into mutual appreciation and esteem, and a consequence was, when Jefferson became President of the United States, that he transferred, April 1, 1802, Major Williams to the head of the Corps of Engineers, created by the recent law of March 16, 1802, by which it was provided that the "principal engineer" should be the Superintendent of the Military Academy. On the 8th of July following, he was promoted to be Lieutenant-Colonel.

It was truly fortunate for the Military Academy that its first Superintendent was such a man as Major Williams, with the ripe experience of fifty-two years of an eventful life; with the patriot instincts of his Revolutionary sire; with a mind liberally educated, and stored with much scientific and general information; with the pen of a ready writer which had done good service in our struggle for independence; with a judgment matured by a mercantile intercourse abroad and high social position at home; with great decision of character and untiring zeal in the public service; and withal a most kind and polished gentleman, and a brave and chivalric soldier. To such pledges for success in his important command, he added industry, exactness, patience, and benevolence. Under the influence of his accomplished example, the Academy quickly received tone and character, steadily advanced in discipline and usefulness, and brought forth golden fruit in its distinguished graduates.

Major Williams assumed his new command, May 13, 1802, but did not take up his residence at West Point till July 3 following. Meanwhile, in various communications to the Secretary of War and others, he presented his views of the object and wants of the projected Academy. He recommended the purchase of the best military and scientific books; the procuring of philosophical and other apparatus; the detail of artificers to make models, and of some soldiers for general work; and proposed brief regulations for conducting studies, occupancy of existing buildings, and command of the institution and post of West Point, the headquarters of the Corps of Engineers, which, under the law of March 16, 1802, constituted the Military Academy.

Under Major Williams as Superintendent, the Military Academy was formally opened for instruction, July 4, 1802, with ten cadets,¹ — Joseph G. Swift, Joseph Proveaux, Simon M. Levy, Henry B. Jackson, Samuel Gates, William Gates, Walker K. Armistead, John Lillie, Ambrose Porter, and John Livingston, all of whom, except the last, had been appointed prior to the law of March 16, 1802, which authorized ten cadets of engineers and forty of artillery. The Superintendent was without any military staff, and there were only two teachers, — Captain William Amherst Barron and Jared Mansfield, of the Corps of Engineers; both giving instruction in mathematics, the former in the line of geometrical, the latter in that of algebraical, demonstration.

Captain BARRON was the son of a surgeon in the British Army, who belonged to the medical staff of Lord William Amherst, when commanding the English forces in the conquest of Canada, and after whom the captain was named. He was graduated in the same class with John Quincy Adams at Harvard University, Cambridge, Mas., where he had been a tutor; was appointed, May 6, 1800, a Captain in the Second Regiment of Artillerists and Engineers; and April 17, 1802, was transferred to the Corps of Engineers. He was a man of social temper and fair abilities, and had a faculty for teaching.

Captain MANSFIELD was a graduate of Yale College, and subsequently a teacher of mathematics, navigation, and the classics at New Haven, Conn., and at Philadelphia, Pa. He enjoyed a high reputation for learning, and was the author of able essays on scientific subjects. President Jefferson, knowing his talents, had appointed him, May 3, 1802, a Captain of Engineers, with an express view to his becoming an instructor at West Point.

With these slight appliances, instruction was necessarily much circumscribed, being limited to the mathematics of Hutton's first volume, and the elements of fortification given in lectures from a small pamphlet of fifty pages, translated from the French by the Superintendent, with practical illustrations on the field. Study hours were from 9 A. M. to 2 P. M., every day except Sunday, and practical exercises four days in every week from 4 P. M. to sunset.

The kind of discipline to be observed can be best given in the Superintendent's own words: "It is my opinion that every officer and cadet should be treated with the politeness and attention becoming military men. It is my determination to exact the most pointed attention to all academical duties and rules, whether relating to study, dress, deportment, or anything else. The interior of the Academy, in the hours allotted to instruction, must be considered like a parade among military men when on duty, and only the objects of the institution must be permitted. Nothing is more requisite in the attainment of knowledge than harmony between the instructors and the instructed, and nothing more certainly produces harmony than mutual respect, with an invariable attention to rule."

In another letter to an engineer officer at Washington, it will be seen that the Superintendent aspired to something higher than these feeble beginnings. "In your conversations with the Secretary of War," writes he, "pray impress upon his mind the importance of making any candidate for a commission serve some time as a cadet, and then give proof of his merit before he is promoted. . . . Young men who care for nothing but the exteriors of an officer have no business among us. In all your conversations with the Secretary, never lose sight of our leading star, which is not a little mathematical school, but a great national establishment to turn out characters which, in the course of time, shall equal any in Europe. . . . We must always bear it in mind that our officers are to be men of science, and such as will by their acquirements be entitled to the notice of learned societies. Could we arrive at such a state before the present peace is disturbed, we may defy foreign invaders of all nations." He continues with urging "the absolute necessity of a drawing master and a teacher of French."

The means of instruction were not less inadequate to the wants of the Academy than were the buildings at West Point, most of which were small one or two story houses. Cadet Joseph G. Swift gives the following description of them and their surroundings: "West Point Plain is 190 feet above the level of the Hudson, and forms an area of 70 acres, bounded by the margin of the plain overlooking the river on the east and north. The buildings which I found on my first arrival at the Point [Oct. 15, 1801] were, at the north dock, a storehouse; on the brow of the hill above, the first dwelling is the 'White Quarters,' the residence then of the Commandant, Lieutenant Osborne, and his beautiful wife; and then the 'Artillery Mess' of Lieutenants Wilson and Howard. The Academy is situated on the western margin of the plain, near the base of rocks on whose summit, 500 feet above, stands Fort Putnam. Near the Academy was an office on the edge of a small hollow, in which depression were the remains of a mound that had been formed at the close of the Revolution to celebrate the birth of a dauphin of France, our great ally in those days. To the south of this relic were the 'Headquarters' that had been the residence of General Knox and the scene of many a humble meal partaken by Washington and his companions in arms [since 1791 the residence of Major George Fleming, the Military Storekeeper], further south, the quarters of Lieutenants J. Wilson and A. Macomb, and a small building afterwards used for a laboratory. In front of these was the 'Model Yard,' containing a miniature fortress in wood, used in the lectures on fortification, the handiwork of Colonel Rochefontaine and Major Rivardi. Around this yard Cadet Armistead and myself planted twelve elm-trees. To the south, and at the base of Fort Putnam hill, were Rochefontaine's quarters, now the residence of the family of Major Williams. Diagonally from the garden gate of these quarters Rochefontaine had constructed a paved walk to the barracks on the northeast side of the plain, now the cadet quarters. They are 240 feet in length, and were constructed by Major Rivardi, whose quarters were in a building at the northern base of the Fort Putnam hill, by the road leading to the German Flats [now cadets' garden and cemetery] and Washington's Valley. Below the plain at the northwest, near the river, were the military stores, — two long yellow buildings, containing the arms and accoutrements of the army of Burgoyne, and also numerous brass ordnance surrendered at Saratoga, and especially a couple of brass 'grasshoppers' [now inserted in the interior wall of the Chapel], taken by General Greene in South Carolina, and, by resolution of Congress, presented to that very distinguished commander, all under the care of Major Fleming, who seemed to view them as almost his own property, he having served in the conquest at 'Bemus' Heights' and Saratoga. To the east of these stores was the Armory, and also the residence of Zebina Kinsley, the Armorer, and his exemplary wife. To the east was the Hospital, under the charge of Dr. Nicholas Jones, our Surgeon, and brother to Mrs. Lieutenant Osborne. At the northeast angle of the plain was Fort Clinton,¹ a dilapidated work of Generals Duportail [Radière] and Kosciusko, engineers in the Revolutionary War. This work was armed with four 24-pounder cannon on seacoast carriages, and within it was a long stone magazine filled with powder 'many years of age.' To the west and overlooking the plain, at 500 feet above, is Fort Putnam,² a stone-casemated castle, having in its terreplein a couple of 24-pounder guns. This work was commenced in 1778, and had been repaired at various periods, and never completed. The tradition was that Arnold had proposed to admit British troops from the rear of this castle to overawe the plain and works below. A surer plan for the purpose of the traitor could not have been devised.

“Below the eastern margin of the plain there are stone steps leading to a small area, whose outward edge is of rock, sloping almost vertically to the Hudson. In this area is a small basin, in which had played a fountain, the whole having been constructed by Kosciusko, and was his retreat, and called for him ‘Kosciusko’s Garden,’¹ and is a favorite resort. Some ninety yards southwest of Rivardi’s barracks is a circular depression in the plain, on the west margin of which are the ruins of the ‘Old Provost’ [the embryo Academic building burned in 1795]. Nearly a mile northwest of the Point, a ravine leads to a cascade over a rock, the water from which winds to the Hudson at the ‘Red House,’ the occasional resting-place of Washington, called Washington’s Valley, and is at the termination of the slope of the Cro’ Nest, a mountain of 1,500 feet in altitude, overlooking the Point and Hudson, and many miles around. Adjoining the south boundary of the plain a road leads down the banks of the Hudson to Buttermilk Falls and to Fort Montgomery. The last-named is the scene of the defeat of General Clinton, October, 1777. The road previously mentioned passed through the farm of Esquire North, whose house stood near the south boundary of the plain, a tavern that much annoyed the command at West Point by selling rum to the soldiers, because of an illegal act of Captain Settle, of the Army, who in 1794 had leveled a field-piece at North's house and suffered a severe penalty therefor in a lawsuit. Mr. North's victory proved him to be a bad citizen, and his success an evidence of the law's supremacy."

Some of the buildings referred to by Cadet Swift were repaired after the opening of the Academy; the old Continental Barracks, in Fort Clinton, were pulled down; and the occupancy of quarters was fixed by the first Regulations of the Military Academy (only three pages), approved July 29, 1802.

By these Regulations the rights of command of the Superintendent of the Military Academy, and the senior officer of the company of artillery garrisoning the post of West Point, were defined; but so imperfectly that differences soon arose, which were aggravated by a sharp correspondence.

During the summer of 1802, instruction was continued, and the use of instruments taught by a survey of West Point and the determination of the elevation of the neighboring highlands, Cro' Nest, Break-Neck, Anthony's Nose, Sugar Loaf, etc.

Early in October commenced the first public examination at the Military Academy, conducted by the Superintendent and Captains Barron and Mansfield. Cadets Swift and Levy, who had been transferred, July 28, 1802, from the Artillery to the Engineers, were examined in Hutton's Mathematics, Enfield's Philosophy, Scheel's Artillery, and the Elements of Fortification, using the model front of a fort at West Point, constructed, as the tradition ran, by Rochefontaine and Rivardi, French engineers formerly in our service. Cadets Swift and Levy, being found duly qualified, and having received certificates of proficiency from the professors, were promoted, Oct. 12, 1802, to be Second Lieutenants in the Corps of Engineers.

Four months after the formal opening of the Academy, Nov. 4, 1802, the first cadet was admitted upon the following testimonial given by the professors after a careful examination of the candidate, whose distinguished after-career makes it noteworthy : —

“ We certify that we have, agreeably to an academic order of the 20th inst., examined in the elements of Arithmetic (vulgar and decimal), in English Grammar, and in Penmanship, JOSEPH GILBERT TOTTEN, aged 14 years, on the 23d August, 1802, a candidate for a Cadetship in the Corps of Engineers, and find him well qualified in the aforesaid branches.

(Signed) “ W. A. BARRON, Capt. of Engineers.

“ To LIEUT.-COLONEL JON. WILLIAMS, Commanding Engineers, and Supt. Military Academy.”

Doctor JOHN WATSON, a hired citizen physician, subsequently, Nov. 22, 1803, appointed Surgeon's Mate, was the only medical officer, till his death, May 31, 1812, at the Military Academy. His employment probably arose from having to send to Peekskill, then the nearest post town, for a surgeon to treat Cadet William Gates, whose hand was accidentally shot through, in July, 1802, by a wooden ramrod. The doctor refusing to go to West Point, Cadet Swift had to play surgeon.

As it was almost an impossibility for officers and cadets to endure the severity of West Point winters in their wretched quarters, and thinking it was desirable to relieve them from continuous study, the Secretary of War directed that vacations should commence annually on the first of December, and terminate on the 15th of March following, at which time, or earlier if directed, all were expected promptly to return to resume their academical pursuits, and during vacation to report monthly by letter to the Superintendent. Great irregularities, however, in the return of cadets from these vacations, took place. They were finally discontinued by Major Thayer, in 1817, when he became Superintendent of the Academy. Occasionally some few officers and cadets, whose homes were distant, remained at West Point during the winter, but study and recitations were optional.

Early in 1803, the Secretary of War urged the removal of the Academy to the seat of the government, but fortunately the law of March 16, 1802, fixed its location at West Point.

The President approved, Feb. 28, 1803, an act very important to the welfare of the Academy. It authorized the appointment of "one Teacher of the French language, and one Teacher of Drawing, to be attached to the Corps of Engineers, whose compensation shall not exceed the pay and emoluments of a captain in the line of the Army;" and gave to the chief engineer power "to enlist, for a term not less than three years, one artificer and eighteen men, to aid in making practical experiments, and for other purposes."

FRANCIS DESIRÉ MASSON, April 12, 1803, was strongly recommended for the position under this law of Teacher of French at the Military Academy. He was a native of France, from which country his family had emigrated to St. Domingo, where his father became a rich planter, and President of the Provincial Parliament. In 1789, the island was in a most flourishing condition; but the French Revolution and the Slave Insurrection in 1791 interrupted its valuable commerce and profitable industries, by which the Massons lost all their property. In consequence, Francis and his brother Florimond came to the United States about 1794, the former taking up his residence in Elizabethtown, N. J., where he was much beloved as a teacher, to which occupation his poverty compelled him to resort. He was a highly educated and accomplished gentleman; had a fine military bearing and haughty air; was quick and impatient in temper; and though somewhat obsequious to superiors, commanded the respect of inferiors. On the 12th of July following he was appointed, by the President, Teacher of French, and also of Drawing, at the Military Academy.

Early in April the academical session of 1803 began, with about the same number of cadets as in the preceding year, some of the old ones having been commissioned and some new ones appointed.

The Superintendent, at this time, was absent in North Carolina on a tour of engineer inspection. The collision of authority over the company of artillery garrisoning West Point continued till May 21, 1803, when Captain Izard was ordered to Norfolk, Va., leaving, however, a detachment of his company under Lieutenant Osborne, thereby lessening but not removing the cause of irritation. Lieut.-Colonel Williams, on his return through Washington, in an interview with the Secretary of War, found his authority over the troops at West Point would not be sustained by General Dearborn, who measured the status of our educated native engineers by the standard of the many ignorant foreign employees of the Revolution, of whom, of course, he had a low opinion. Without definitely deciding the right of command, which was the real issue, he chose to temporize by leaving West Point without an artillery officer. But Lieut.-Colonel Williams did not choose to remain in doubt; and when he demanded defined powers, he received an answer from the Secretary which, to a true soldier, was too humiliating to leave a moment's hesitation as to his course of action. At once he threw up his commission, by which the Corps of Engineers lost its efficient chief, his officers their adored father, and the Military Academy its devoted and distinguished Superintendent.

The following, dated Washington, June 20, 1803, is a copy of Lieut.-Colonel Williams's letter of resignation to the Secretary of War : —

“Nothing is more gratifying to my mind than the pursuit of scientific objects, and the station I was placed in, by the partiality of the President of the United States, gave me the pleasing hope that my future life would be so employed as at once to produce the best effect to my country that I am capable of, in the manner the most pleasing to my taste and disposition.

“The answer you have just been pleased to make to certain points which I had the honor of submitting to you, previous to my going to North Carolina, gives me the painful certainty that I can no longer hold my commission without a sense of humiliation which would not only render me contemptible in my own eyes, but totally destroy every shade of respectability with the officers of the corps I command.

“I hope, sir, that, notwithstanding this difference of opinion, you will represent me to the President in the most respectful terms, and believe that I am not influenced by any other motive than what I have stated.”

The next day the Secretary urged Lieut.-Colonel Williams not to resign, but, as there was no change in the Secretary's views, he adhered to his resolution, and took up his residence at Perth Amboy, N. J., soon after leaving service.

The points alluded to in Lieut.-Colonel Williams's letter of resignation were, in substance, that engineer officers have the same military authority, according to rank, as officers of any other corps ; that two independent military commands cannot exist at the same post, and West Point being by law declared to be the station of the Engineers, the chief of that corps, when of higher grade, must command everything at that post; that the authority to arrest officers and confine soldiers belongs to engineers in like circumstances as to other officers; that a senior engineer could not be required to accept the parole or countersign from an inferior officer of any other corps; and that the proceedings of a court martial ought not to be submitted to the revision of any officer inferior in rank to the highest engineer sitting on that court. On these issues the Secretary's opinion was, in effect, that, notwithstanding the General-in-Chief had just placed Major Wadsworth of the Engineers in command of the post and garrison of Fort Adams in the Mississippi Territory, no military command should be attached to any officer of engineers, asserting that this principle was in accordance with general usage and the practice during our Revolutionary War.

The military annals of France, the first country to organize engineers into a separate corps, certainly do not furnish an instance where an officer of engineers has been commanded by an inferior officer of any military corps. In France, engineers have conducted sieges and defended fortresses as commanders-in-chief, and generally have been chosen as governors of citadels. And during our Revolutionary struggle we had only a quasi-corps of engineers, made up of foreign officers engaged for specific purposes. These officers were always so placed, at posts or in the field, as to be commanded by superior American officers, for it was not the policy of the Revolution to intrust chief commands to foreigners.

The Secretary's principle certainly is not to be found in the law of March 16, 1802, organizing a corps of engineers, to consist of officers of various grades, with fixed rank, pay, and emoluments, and with commissions from the President strictly charging and directing all officers and soldiers under their command to be obedient to their orders. Certainly it was never denied that the officers of the Corps of Artillerists and Engineers, under the old peace establishment, were entitled to command according to seniority of rank, equally with the officers of infantry or cavalry, and why, in the separation of the corps into two distinct corps, — one of engineers and another of artillery, — all the authority should be transferred to one set of officers, and none to the other, cannot be conceived, for the new organization was but a separation of artillerists from engineers. The President was not empowered to raise, but to organize, a corps of engineers, as was well understood by the transfer of suitable officers to it from the old Corps of Artillerists and Engineers. In fact, all were transferred with their original dates of commission, proving the new Corps of Artillerists and the new Corps of Engineers to be only a continuation, in separate branches, of the old Corps of Artillerists and Engineers. Certainly officers transferred to the Engineers felt at the time elevated, not degraded, in rank and authority, or they would have remained in their former corps. But though a long and instructive chapter could be written upon this subject, we must resume the history of the Military Academy.

There being now no "Principal Engineer," and the "next in rank" being absent from West Point, the Military Academy was without a legal Superintendent. Under these circumstances the Secretary of War sent, June 21, 1803, to Captain William A. Barron, Acting Professor of Mathematics and Senior Engineer officer at West Point, the following instructions: "Lieut.-Colonel Williams having resigned, the direction of the Military Academy will necessarily be under your care during the absence of Major Wadsworth. You will please to take direction thereof accordingly." Major Wadsworth, now the senior officer of the Corps of Engineers, did not return till some time after, and then but for a short period, consequently the care of the Academy devolved upon Captain Barron till April 19, 1805, when Lieut.-Colonel Williams again became Chief Engineer and Superintendent of the Military Academy.

The academic session of 1803 ran on till the December vacation by the acquired velocity received under Lieut.-Colonel Williams's administration. Towards its close, Nov. 14, 1803, the institution met another severe loss by the President's appointment of Captain Jared Mansfield, Acting Professor of Mathematics, to be Surveyor-General of Ohio and the Northwestern Territory.

The Academy opened again early in April, 1804, with only Captain Barron, the Teacher of French, and about ten cadets. It was a dark year in the history of the Academy. Says an officer of engineers in writing, Oct. 8, 1804, to Lieut.-Colonel Williams: "Never was West Point so much in want of you as at this moment. Everything is going to ruin. Morals and knowledge thrive little, and courts martial and flogging prevail. The Military Academy, instead of being the seat of knowledge and the place of application, is fast turning into that of ignorance and idleness. However, I shall drop the subject, as I know it must be painful to you." Other officers of engineers saw this same deplorable condition of things, and earnestly, by interviews and letters, entreated Lieut.-Colonel Williams to return to service. Headed by Major Wadsworth, the senior officer, they went so far, Nov. 5, 1804, as to propose a direct appeal to the President in relation to the points in controversy which had occasioned Lieut.-Colonel Williams's resignation. There is no doubt that the Secretary of War had discovered his error, but pride forbade his confessing it. Soon after, however, January, 1805, by placing Lieutenant Swift, of the Engineers, in command of the post and artillery garrison at Fort Johnston, N. C., he yielded the point at issue to a subaltern which he had denied to the chief, for whose return to service both he and the President, in many ways, clearly manifested their sincere desire. General Wilkinson, the General-in-Chief, who had been most zealous in the good work, wrote to Lieut.-Colonel Williams: "I can report nothing more than that I know both the President and Secretary wish you to resume your commission; but there are delicacies on both sides, which I shall labor to accommodate." The following manly letter of Lieut.-Colonel Williams to General Wilkinson, dated Jan. 5, 1805, best expresses his views: . . . "I know your sentiments with respect to the rights of the engineers, and, were your power equal to your disposition to do them justice, I would have no hesitation in submitting everything respecting myself to you; but there is a consistency of character which I can by no means consent to forfeit, and therefore, if I enter the Army again, it must be with the full approbation of the Government, and with a certainty that my situation will be rendered equally honorable and permanent. . . . How has it happened that the Corps of Engineers should be degraded below the other parts of the Army? If it was worth organizing, it was surely worth while to have men of some sentiment of honor to compose it, but how can this ever be the case when they are exposed to be pointed at by the slow-moving finger of scorn, which must inevitably follow the present humiliating system? A slight but candid revision of the situation of the corps, since this unfortunate question was first agitated, must evince the impossibility of its ever being reputably filled unless its rights are restored to it.

Major Wadsworth avowedly remains only because he has not at present other resources, and is taking measures to enable him to resign.¹ Captain Mansfield has obtained a more lucrative office; and Captain Barron has assured me that the same reason induces him to remain, and is looking out for some other means of support, and there are no applicants for engineer commissions. How can zeal be expected from men who, like the apothecary in 'Romeo and Juliet,' confess their 'poverty, not their will, consents'? This thing is so unaccountable and so extraordinary, that it seems to me like a dream, although it is eighteen months since the reality forced me out of the corps. Were I to judge from the personal deportment and verbal expressions of the Secretary of War, before the last and decisive interview, I should have supposed the Corps of Engineers to have been, in his estimation, the most important part of the Army, which he was disposed to cherish to the utmost in his power. The President expressed himself in relation to the corps in terms not merely polite, but of the most friendly description. Where, then, is the cause of this change? I cannot charge it to any conduct of mine, because that, especially in the last piece of duty, appeared to be fully approved. Can it be owing to any jealousy in the other parts of the Army? I think not, for all the officers I know are completely of my opinion, and our friend, Adjutant-General Cushing, seemed to be of the opinion that a line might be adopted perfectly agreeable to the Secretary of War and me. What that line is, he, perhaps, may tell you, but I know it not unless it be what I have stated."

To this letter General Wilkinson replied, March 29, 1805: "I am authorized by the Secretary of War to inform you that, if agreeable to you, the President will re-appoint you to the command of the Corps of Engineers on the express condition that you are not to interfere with the discipline, police, or command of the troops of the line but by his orders, to which alone you are to be subject, and that in all other respects you are to enjoy the honors due to your rank.

“Should this proposition be acceptable to you, you will be pleased to signify your disposition to the Secretary of War without delay, and in such explicit terms as may preclude misapprehension.

“The President is now at Monticello, but will be here about the 8th of the next month, at which time, should it be agreeable to you, you may make a visit to the city, in order to pay your respects to our superior.

“Permit me, sir, to add my earnest hopes that you may not pause for a determination in this case, because I am convinced you will stand acquitted by every professional man of intelligence and honor, should you embrace the proposition. It is unquestionable that the elevated pursuits of the Corps du Génie do not allow time for the necessary attentions to the details, police, and discipline of the line; and it follows, as in other services, that the officers of that corps should not be burthened with the responsibility attached to duties in their nature incompatible. But, admitting the practices of other nations to be at variance with our own, if the United States are acknowledged to be sovereign and independent, we cannot deny to the regular authority powers and capacities to ordain such subordinate arrangements as may be deemed conducive to the public weal, and it is the duty of every good citizen to conform, when such conformity does not affect his honor. In the case before us, the suspension of ex-official command is deemed essential to the interests of a particular corps, but no subversion of inherent principles or fundamental right takes effect, because you are held liable to general command upon the orders of the President.

“I beg to hear from you soon, and, I hope, to my satisfaction. You owe much to the partiality of the President, more to the claims of your country.”

Major Macomb of the Engineers, subsequently General-in-Chief, in a private letter of April 2, 1805, expresses the desires of the Corps of Engineers: . . . “It is the wish, I am persuaded, of the officers of the corps. You have had assurances enough of their attachment, and I feel confident that you are interested in their welfare, and I believe it no flattery when I tell you that their respectability as a corps, and their future prosperity, depends almost entirely on your return. Feeling satisfied that you cannot resist the call of your country and the solicitations of your own corps to take your former station, I am,” etc.

This correspondence led to the General-in-Chief’s official order of April 17, 1805, as follows:—

“As the scientific pursuits of the Corps of Engineers do not allow time for attention to details, police, and discipline of the troops of the line, it follows, as in other services, that the officers of that corps should not be burthened with the responsibility attached to duties in their nature incompatible.

“The President has thought proper to decide, that the officers of the Engineers shall not interfere with the discipline, police, or command of the troops of the line, unless by his special order, to which alone they are subject.

“But this suspension of official command, though deemed essential to the interests of a particular corps, does not subvert any inherent principle, or fundamental right, because the superior officers of Engineers are held liable to be called into general command whenever the public service may require, and the will of the President direct.

“In all cases not affected by this regulation, the officers of the Corps of Engineers are invariably to enjoy the respect due to their commissions; and they are to receive the same honors which are paid to officers of similar grade in the line of the Army."

Lieut.-Colonel Williams accepted, April 19, 1805, the re-appointment of Chief Engineer, and wrote to the Secretary of War: "In answer to the obliging information you have given me in the command of the Corps of Engineers, I beg leave to assure you that this honorable mark of favor has made a deep impression on me, and it is with heartfelt gratitude that I again offer to devote my life to the service of my country. I hope and trust that the President will permit me to resume my old commission in the same manner as if it had never been resigned. It must be evident to him that I never had a wish to quit the service, and that the circumstances by which I was influenced, although arising out of misapprehension, appeared to me paramount to my own will. The explanation which has taken place has put the subject on a correct footing, which will not in future admit of mistake, and it is my wish so to come into service again that the whole might be buried in oblivion."

During the twenty-two months that Lieut.-Colonel Williams had been out of service, neither the Military Academy nor the Corps of Engineers progressed one step. In that interval, but two cadets had been graduated; "not a cadet's warrant was applied for," says the best authority, and of the dozen who entered the Academy, half had probably been previously promised their appointment, and the other half were from the newly organized Territory of Louisiana, perhaps more ostensibly to mark President Jefferson's important purchase, April 13, 1803, of that magnificent domain.

Immediately upon Lieut.-Colonel Williams being notified, April 22, 1805, of his re-appointment, he repaired to West Point, and assumed command of the Military Academy, which was opened for instruction with Captain W. A. Barron, Acting Professor of Mathematics; Francis D. Masson, Teacher of French and Drawing; Lieut. Alex. Macomb, Adjutant; John Watson, Surgeon's Mate; two cadets of Engineers, and seventeen of Artillery, which number was soon after increased.

The Superintendent at once vigorously applied himself to much-needed reformatory measures. The following programme of duties was adopted: Drills, 5 to 6 A. M., under Lieutenant Macomb; mathematical recitations and study, 8 to 11 A. M.; French and drawing, alternate days, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M.; study, 2 to 4 P. M.; and after 4 P. M., practical gunnery with field-pieces, surveying, or practical engineering in delineating fortifications on the ground. The Superintendent urgently solicited the return of Major Mansfield to West Point, for, says he: "There is not a man in our country, in my opinion, better calculated for a mathematical instructor, as well on account of his amiable character as his professional knowledge." He asked for music, even a drum and fife, and requested that the cadets' uniforms be defined and made all alike, they having previously worn the respective dress of the corps — Engineers or Artillery — to which they belonged, and having clothed themselves latterly pretty much as they liked. He submitted a plan for messing cadets, who lived poorly and expensively, buying their food from rascally contractors, "who ought to be sent to state prison" for levying "a tax on their stomachs to save the agents' pockets." The cadets, he says, "have been in the habit of taking their rations in money, that is, 27 cents per day, and then buying provisions, for which they pay what people here think proper to charge them; and as they get money only at the end of a certain time, they are obliged to go upon credit in the mean time, which of course increases the price, and leaves them at the mercy of some one creditor. In this way both pay and rations are swallowed up in food, and they have nothing left for clothing. If a mess house were established by authority, and proper utensils provided under the direction of a steward, the meals all regulated in quantity and quality, I am confident but little if anything more than the present rations would be sufficient. Considering, however, that a great part consist of young lads whose age and health might require some spoon meat and other deviations, it might be best to withdraw cadets' rations entirely, and furnish a regular public table, such as is established at Cambridge, New Haven, and Princeton."

The Secretary of War responded, with great good will, to these various requisitions, and personally attended to the smallest details, even to ordering the importation of "ten sets of mathematical instruments and a gross of lead pencils." He approved of such messing arrangements as the Superintendent might judge expedient. Accordingly the mess house was opened July 27, 1805, Captain Barron supervising and presiding at every meal. After trial, the cost of messing was found to be thirty cents per day, "the fare being plain and simple without any luxuries," which was a little more than the commutation of the two rations, leaving the cadets less than their pay proper for all other purposes, the consequence of which was that before the end of the year they were "literally in rags." To remedy this the Superintendent made a forcible but fruitless appeal to the Secretary of War for "an allowance of clothing to cadets as non-commissioned officers."

Though the advantages of a general mess were manifest, and cost only three cents per day more than the contract price (27 cents) of cadets' two rations, this trifle was too large to pass the meshes of the red-tape web of the auditing officers at Washington, who disallowed the whole account. Lieut.-Colonel Williams appealed to the Secretary of War, saying: "I have been actuated in this messing business by the purest principle of regard to the welfare of these youths, I may add of humanity, for I am sure you would have revolted at the idea of subsisting young lads, just from their parents' firesides, many for the first time absent from their daily care, in the manner they were subsisted before the mess was established." The superiority of the new to the old system was set forth in a letter inclosed from Major Barron, who says: "Students should have no concern in providing for their diet. They destroy that time which should be devoted to study; and it is attended with many other prejudicial effects. If the mess be dissolved, cadets must resort to their former mode of subsisting. They must form small messes; their provisions be cooked by soldiers; much will be wasted; much will be purloined; and the residue cooked in a dirty, slovenly manner. At the close of the month, on the settlement of accounts, the cadet finds that his rations and half of his pay have been consumed in support of a table at which he has lived like a pig; that the remaining half of his pay, five dollars, is insufficient to meet demands for necessary clothing, washing, and mending; not a cent left for the enjoyment of the innocent amusements of society, and parents and friends (almost universally) unable to assist him. In addition to which, he finds that his time has been broken, and his progress in science impeded."

Three cadets of Engineers were commissioned in 1805, after which all new appointments were made as cadets of Artillery, their subsequent promotion to be cadets of Engineers being by merit, they receiving a certificate of their proficiency.

The academic term of 1806 opened early in April with twenty-three cadets. For practical instruction in artillery, four field-pieces and two mortars had been received, with which cadets drilled according to De Scheel's tactics; and Lieutenant Bomford gave lessons at the laboratory in pyrotechny and the preparation of fixed ammunition. For the instruction of the more advanced cadets, a requisition was made for copies of "Adams' Graphical Essays" and "Enfield's Natural Philosophy." A chaplain was asked for, and a request made for another professor in place of Major Mansfield, still absent. Major Barron, the only scientific instructor present, made some excellent suggestions on the programme of studies and additions for the convenience and efficiency of the Academy.

The removal of the institution to Washington was still contemplated, and therefore little had been done for outdoor improvements. The Superintendent, writing to the Secretary of War, May 22, 1806, says in substance that, considering West Point a temporary station for the Corps of Engineers and Military Academy, he forbears making the same requisitions as if it were the permanent headquarters. The barracks, if thoroughly repaired, would furnish thirty-two commodious rooms and chambers; the Academy, now uninhabitable on the ground floor, has one room above, 30 ft. \times 15 ft., with a fireplace, which should be repaired; the Superintendent's house of three stories would be a considerable addition to the quarters of the officers, professors, etc.; the doctor's dwelling, if repaired, would do for the storekeeper; the commissary store, under the hill, is a nuisance and groggery, and should be demolished; a smith's shop and tools are much wanted; the carpenter's shop should be completed, and supplied with tools; the public grounds should be inclosed with a stone wall; water supply should be brought in hollow logs; the general mess has been specially reported upon; the wharf must be repaired, and a barge is much wanted; more privates required for waiters and general work; a smarter band, or at least two drums and fifes, required for full dress parades; academical clock and bell, and morning gun, essential; philosophical and pyrotechnical apparatus and supplies much needed; artillery for experiments in gunnery to be put in order; and many other things will be essential for a permanent establishment.

A general examination took place Oct. 10, 1806, lasting four days, in presence of the Superintendent and the Acting Professor of Mathematics. Seven cadets were examined in arithmetic and the elements of algebra and geometry for advancement; six cadets, in arithmetic, algebra, and geometry, for promotion to the Artillery; and five cadets, in algebra, geometry, including practical surveying of areas and heights, drawing, and elements of fortifications, for promotion to the Engineers. Three of the latter had practical experience in engineering, they having been two months on duty at Fort Jay (now Columbus), New York Harbor; and two had considerable theoretical and practical knowledge of astronomy. Examinations in French were passed over, as all had not had the same advantages, some being native Louisianians, and others had long enjoyed private tuition.

Nine cadets entered the Academy in 1806, and fifteen were graduated. Some of the latter, as was often the case, remained at West Point or at their homes, awaiting promotion to the Army till vacancies should occur.

Notwithstanding Lieut.-Colonel Williams's great industry and zealous devotion to the Academy, he, as the head of the Corps of Engineers, was necessarily absent much of the time attending to professional duties, particularly the construction of the defenses of New York Harbor, of which he took the personal charge. During his absence from West Point, the Academy was under the immediate care of Major Barron, the senior officer of Engineers present, who grossly neglected his duties, and consequently idleness and great irregularities prevailed among cadets.

Lieutenant Gratiot, of the Engineers, Dec. 28, 1806, preferred charges against Major Barron, "for an almost neglect of the Military Academy during the absence of Lieut.-Colonel Williams, thereby not advancing the interest and wishes of the public, and destroying the reputation of the institution." For this and gross personal derelictions, he was brought before a court martial, and, pending trial, tendered his resignation, which was accepted, June 15, 1807.

On the arrest, April 14, 1807, of Major Barron, the command of the Military Academy, in the absence of Lieut.-Colonel Williams in South Carolina, devolved upon Captain Joseph G. Swift, under whose auspices it was opened for instruction with Francis D. Masson, Teacher of French and Drawing, and Ferdinand R. Hassler, who had been appointed Acting Professor of Mathematics.

Professor HASSLER was born, Oct. 6, 1770, at Aarau, in Switzerland. He studied mathematics and natural philosophy, particularly their practical applications, in the University of Göttingen and at Paris. He had been the Attorney-General of the Canton of Berne, and frequently had been employed in making statistical surveys and on other public works under the successive governments of his native land, his most important duty having been the direction of the great geodetic survey of Switzerland. Being an ardent Republican, he could not brook French interference in the affairs of his native land, and therefore emigrated to the United States. He was appointed, Feb. 14, 1807, Acting Professor of Mathematics by President Jefferson, at the instance of his countryman, Albert Gallatin, then Secretary of the Treasury. Hassler, though renowned as a profound mathematician, philosopher, and astronomer, was not a very successful instructor, except for those gifted with a mathematical genius, and who consequently least needed his aid. His was not a common, but a refined and analytical mind, taught by processes of its own. Never having been a teacher in his younger days, he had no conception of the methods by which knowledge is best conveyed to inferior or ordinary intellects. Besides, he understood nothing of discipline, a defect the cadets were quick to discover; hence they dropped one by one into the academic halls, recited the little they had learned, and then unceremoniously left, to go where they pleased. Between unruly boys and his irregularly paid starvation salary of $700 per year, the poor professor had a hard time at the Academy.

He left West Point at the close of the academic term of 1809, and, after trial, was elected, March 20, 1810, Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Union College, at Schenectady, N. Y. Here also he showed himself less a teacher than a devotee to science, as the following anecdote, related by President Nott, will show: One day the dinner-bell rang before the professor had finished his lecture; but, so completely absorbed was he in his subject, that he heard not the signal, at which the students retired for something more attractive. Long he continued lecturing to bare walls and empty benches, and was only stopped when the doorkeeper, becoming impatient for his dinner, handed the professor the key, begging him to lock the door when he had finished his lecture.

Hassler, having been selected to direct the United States Coast Survey, authorized by the law of Feb. 10, 1807, went to Europe, Sep. 4, 1811, to procure the necessary instruments and standards of measure for commencing the work, but, in consequence of our declaration of war against Great Britain, he was detained in England as an alien enemy till 1815. Upon his return, Oct. 22, 1815, he was formally appointed the Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, but did not commence his field labors (measuring a base-line near the Hudson) till 1816. In 1818 the survey was in effect discontinued and not resumed till 1832, from which time Professor Hassler directed this great work till his labors were closed by death, Nov. 20, 1843, at Philadelphia, Pa.

Our foreign relations were such in 1807 that the State of New York was unwilling to trust the safety of her great commercial capital to the small appropriations granted by Congress. Fortifications consequently were authorized to be erected on Staten Island for the defense of "the Narrows." The authorities, having great confidence in Lieut.-Colonel Williams, then superintending the defenses of the inner harbor of New York, as a man of solid learning and sound judgment, and possessing a practical knowledge of the military art, selected him to plan and conduct their works (Forts Richmond and Tompkins). So devoted was he to these duties, which consumed most of his time, that the freedom of the city of New York was bestowed upon him by the Corporation, Aug. 1, 1807, "in consideration of his important services in protecting and fortifying said city." Subsequently, Governor Daniel D. Tompkins, of New York, sent a large check to Lieut.-Colonel Williams in a very complimentary letter, saying: "Your services to the State are not only viewed by me, but also by the Legislature, in the most thankful manner." Perhaps it is unnecessary to add that the check was politely returned by the noble-minded recipient.

The defenses of New York Harbor absorbed this year much of the attention of Lieut.-Colonel Williams. With him absent, and only civilian professors, who were foreigners, it was difficult for the commanding officer to maintain rigid discipline at the Academy; hence there were frequent courts martial. These courts were ordered by the Superintendent, who reviewed the proceeding and had power to carry out sentences extending "to expulsion from the Academy," but the Secretary of War's confirmation was necessary before a cadet's name "could be expunged from the list of the Army." In those days a cadet could be a member of a court martial for the trial of a soldier, and, in a noted instance, a cadet (Kelly) was the judge advocate of a court for the trial of a captain of artillery. From these circumstances it would appear that a cadet was considered, under the law of 1802, in the light of an officer of the lowest grade of his corps, though holding no commission. The fact of a lieutenant, in 1807, having challenged a cadet, would also support this view.

The Academy closed in 1807 on the 23d of November, after the annual examination, at which only five cadets were graduated. During the year, seventeen had been appointed.

Up to this time, not half the number of cadets authorized by law had been appointed, and existing vacancies in the Army, notwithstanding the earnest protests of Lieut.-Colonel Williams, were being filled by civilians who had no military education. No one knew better than himself, transformed from a merchant to a soldier, how many years of close study and practice were necessary to compensate for the lack of that early training as essential to the military as to all civil professions; and seven years' familiar acquaintance with a military school had taught him that the scientific skeleton of an army was more quickly and cheaply created at a special academy than in the field. The rank and file of an army, he felt, could be readily improvised, but to make of them a well-organized and homogeneous disciplined force, ready to face a foreign foe, could best be accomplished by well-instructed officers, particularly those in the higher grades or filling staff positions.

The Treaty of Paris, 1783, by which our independence was acknowledged by the mother country, was virtually a truce, not a peace. The Revolution had effected our political emancipation and proved our capacity for self-defense; but our moral, physical, and mental independence were yet to be achieved, and the strength of republican and confederate nationality demonstrated. Wearied with war, we had continued, from the termination of our seven years' Revolutionary struggle, to practice patient forbearance under the pressure of accumulated wrongs. Great Britain, still our bitter enemy, had violated her plighted faith by retaining the American posts upon the northern frontier; her voice was loud along the border, continually inciting the Indian savages to war upon us; our commerce was the prey of her cruisers and privateers; our merchant vessels were searched and our native sailors impressed upon the high seas; our trade and navigation became the sport of her cupidity and assumption; and the enormity of her paper blockades was exceeding all bounds. The British order in council, of May 16, 1806, declared the whole French coast in a state of blockade,—an order which Napoleon retaliated by his Berlin decree of Nov. 21, 1806, declaring the blockade of the British Islands; and this latter was answered by another order of the former power, Jan. 7, 1807, prohibiting all coast trade with France. Great numbers of our vessels, under these oppressive orders and decrees, were seized by the cruisers of both belligerents, and our lucrative neutral commerce was nearly destroyed. British ships of war hovered, in warlike display, upon our coasts; blockaded our forts ; penetrated our bays and rivers ; anchored in our harbors ; threatened our cities and towns with conflagration, and even fired upon the unprotected inhabitants of our shores. The public mind was highly incensed by these gross violations of our neutrality ; but the climax of insolence was reached June 22, 1807, in the ever memorable attack of the ship Leopard, of fifty guns, under the countenance of the British squadron anchored within American waters, upon the United States frigate Chesapeake, by which twenty-one men were killed or wounded. The President, by proclamation, interdicted our harbors and waters to all British armed vessels, forbade intercourse with them, and demanded immediate reparation for this last high-handed outrage, but not till four years after did the tardy atonement come. Another order in council was issued, Nov. 11, 1807, forbidding neutral vessels to enter French harbors until they had previously stopped at a British port and paid duties on their cargoes. Napoleon, not to be outdone, answered, Dec. 17, 1807, by his famous Milan decree, confiscating any vessel which should submit to British search or pay any duties to his great enemy.

The United States could no longer, with honor, permit its flag to be insulted, its citizens to be enslaved, and its property to be plundered on the highway of nations ; but placed between the upper and nether millstone of two colossal powers, and unprepared to contend with either, Congress, upon the recommendation of the President, temporized by laying an embargo, Dec. 22, 1807, upon its vessels in American ports, and ordered the immediate return of all our shipping afloat.

This gloomy condition of things rendered it manifestly proper for the Chief Engineer to ask for an increase of his corps, then composed of a few officers superintending an extended line of coast defenses, and to submit, Sep. 19, 1807, a project to remodel the Military Academy, the principal features of his plan being as follows:—

Major Mansfield, with the brevet rank of Lieut.-Colonel, to be Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, and, as head of the academic staff, to be the Director of Studies; Professor Hassler, with the brevet rank of Major, to be Professor of Mathematics, having an assistant with the brevet rank of Captain; Teacher Masson, with the brevet rank of Major, to be Professor of Fortification, Drawing, and the French Language, having two assistants with the brevet rank of Captains; and Captain Walbach, who had served as a cavalry officer in Germany and France, to be Professor of Equitation. These professors and their assistants to be distinct from the organization of the Corps of Engineers, “but to remain connected with it as an additional staff, and to be allowed an adequate salary in lieu of the present mode of pay.” Besides these, he proposed honorary Professors of Architecture, and of Chemistry and Mineralogy, “to attend at the Academy three months in the year, and give a course of lectures, theoretical and practical.”

In a communication to the President, made a few months later, Lieut.-Colonel Williams recommended the addition of a Riding Master, and Teacher of Broad and Small Sword; appropriations for buildings, apparatus, library, etc.; and to extend the plan of the Academy to include, subject to the Rules and Articles of War, the minor officers of the Navy, and Pay Cadets designed for the Army and Navy or civil life. “As these youths grow up and take their stations in society, they would naturally become militia, and in a few years, in the ordinary course of events, we should see a uniformity in our militia, resulting from a spirit of emulation, which the reputation of having received a military education would naturally excite, and the same duties which have often been considered a burthen would become a pleasurable privilege. There is nothing more fascinating to youth than excellence in arms, and a little knowledge will excite a desire to acquire more." He concludes his report saying that, in order "that Congress may have as little trouble as possible, and to avoid a frequent recurrence to its authority on matters of course, it might perhaps be expedient to pass one short act, naming the additions to be made to the Corps of Engineers, but placing the direction of the Academy, external and internal, in the President of the United States, leaving the site of the buildings, the number and kind of professors, and all other matters connected with the institution, entirely to his judgment."

The dangers to our country arising from the contests of other nations, the ruin of our commerce in the Mediterranean, the capture of our vessels bound to the Baltic, France, and Spain, the violation of our territory, the insults to our people, and the degrading our character in the eyes of the whole world, roused the President to ask Congress, Feb. 25, 1808, for an augmentation of our military force to 6,000 regulars and 24,000 volunteers. Rapidly our situation grew more critical, and the great belligerents seemed determined to trample under foot the law of nations, and annihilate every vestige of our neutrality.

President Jefferson, no longer doubting the constitutionality of a Military Academy, sent to Congress, March 18, 1808, the following special message:—

"The scale on which the Military Academy at West Point was originally established has become too limited to furnish the number of well-instructed subjects in the different branches of artillery and engineering which the service calls for. The want of such characters is already sensibly felt, and will be increased with the enlargement of our plans of military preparation. The Chief Engineer, having been instructed to consider the subject, and to propose an augmentation which might render the establishment commensurate with the present circumstances of our country, has made the report which I now transmit for the consideration of Congress.

“The idea suggested by him of removing the institution to this place is also worthy of attention. Besides the advantage of placing it under the immediate eye of the Government, it may render its benefits common to the Naval Department, and will furnish opportunities of selecting, on better information, the characters most qualified to fulfill the duties which the public service may call for.”

The Senate, March 28, 1808, on this message, reported a bill in relation to the Military Academy, which was read, and ordered to a second reading; but April 15, 1808, its further consideration was postponed till the first Monday of the December following.

The report of Williams, promoted to be Colonel Feb. 23, 1808, referred to by the President, was a long document, narrating the struggles of the Academy since 1801, and the character of its few instructors, and concluding with suggestions, essentially as we have already given them, for its re-organization.

The academical term of 1808 began in April, and, in consequence of our threatening relations with Great Britain, the number of cadets present (about 35) was unusually large. Instruction in mathematics was given by Professor Hassler, assisted by Lieut. Alden Partridge; and French and drawing were taught by Francis D. Masson. The wearing of the new cadet uniform was made imperative. Captain Swift, having left West Point on other duty at the beginning of the preceding vacation, Colonel Williams took personal command of the Military Academy to reestablish harmony, and gave orders which he had no doubt of accomplishing, for, says he, "although my conduct towards the young gentlemen is decisive, yet I trust that it will be found so tempered with justice and consideration for their youth and inexperience that even those who may suffer will at a future day applaud it." He summarily arraigned some turbulent cadets before a court martial, and in reporting its proceedings to the Secretary of War, says: "I am sorry to trouble you about such affairs, but you may depend that unless system is preserved, and the cadets know and feel the effects of order and discipline, the Academy will go into confusion; but it shall never do so if I can help it." The Secretary, in reply, writes: "Whenever the young gentlemen at the Academy become turbulent or refractory, and will not listen to admonition, they should be discharged without delay. As a general principle, I think courts martial should not be resorted to for cadets; but if, on suitable inquiry, there appears satisfactory evidence of improper conduct, that admonition or a discharge should follow, according to the circumstances of the case. You will please to let Cadet Smith know that he is discharged from the Academy, and will have his name struck from the roll."

Having restored order, Colonel Williams went back to New York to attend to the defenses of the harbor, leaving the Academy in charge of Lieut. Alden Partridge, by whom it was as well conducted as the then circumstances admitted.

JONATHAN SNOWDEN, who had commanded a company in General St. Clair's Miami Expedition, superseded, June 1, 1808, Captain Alexander Thompson, a veteran of 1794, as Military Storekeeper at West Point. This deprived the latter of all means of support. The fender-hearted Williams, in concluding an official letter of July 26, 1808, to the Secretary of War, says: "You would certainly be moved to compassion were you to see him in his reduced state, surrounded by a respectable though indigent family, — his wife, a woman of an amiable mind, but in delicate health; a blooming daughter (Amelia), about eighteen; a son (Alexander), about fifteen; and two young daughters (Margaret and Catherine), twelve and nine, without an assistant of any kind in the family. . . . Could you have this painful scene before you as I have, I repeat you would be moved with compassion, and I feel assured that I may rely upon a favorable answer to a request I am about to make; it is to give Captain Thompson's son, Alexander Ramsay Thompson, a cadet warrant, to date August 1, 1808, as the intermediate pay is of importance to this poor family."

Francis Desiré Masson, who was Teacher of both French and Drawing, relinquished the latter, Sep. 1, 1808, to Mr. Zoeller, who had, under the law of Feb. 28, 1803, been appointed Teacher of Drawing. Instead of Drawing, Masson gave lectures on Fortification.

CHRISTIAN E. ZOELLER was born in Switzerland; studied mathematics and geodesy at the Academy of Carlsruhe, in Germany; had been employed in the survey of the Alps in the Cantons of Berne, Lausanne, and Lemane, at the salt mines of Bex, and by the Government of Baden; and emigrated to the United States with Professor Hassler, by whom he was highly recommended. He was a good, honest German Swiss, of great purity of character; with limited education; and was a practical surveyor, able to teach the use of instruments, and topographical and lineal drawing. Under his instruction, cadets learned but little, considering, with Dogberry, that drawing must come by nature, not study. Besides, he commanded little of their respect : he was continually joking with them, and placing himself on their level.

During the year 1808, 15 cadets had been graduated, and were promoted to the Army ; and 41 only had been appointed to the Academy, notwithstanding the act of April 12, 1808, largely increasing the military force, authorized the addition of 20 cadets of light artillery, 16 of light dragoons, 20 of rifles, and 100 of infantry, in all 156, besides the 50 already authorized by the law of March 16, 1802, making a total of 206.

The Senate, in its session of 1808-9, voted for the removal of the Academy to Washington, but this measure failed to become a law, its consideration being indefinitely postponed March 3, 1809, by a vote of 49 to 34, in the House of Representatives. Many believed that beneficial results would follow the removal ; that the institution would be brought into greater prominence, and would receive what it most wanted, the fostering care of the Government. On the other hand, it was contended that West Point was a much more eligible situation ; that it would be expensive to the United States to remove the institution, and, after it was removed, to provide public buildings for its accommodation ; and that private property had been embarked in the settlement at West Point, which would be injured by the removal.

Thomas Jefferson ceased, March 4, 1809, to be President of the United States. For seven years he had been the steadfast patron of the Military Academy, created under his auspices. The Corps of Engineers, fully appreciating his paternal care, requested him to sit for his full-length portrait, which was painted by Sully, and now adorns the library of the Military Academy.

Henry Dearborn ended his eight years as Secretary of War with Jefferson's administration. He was a man of vigorous mind; of extensive knowledge of detail; of indefatigable industry; methodical and economical in administration; a good old patriot; and, though not unfriendly to the Academy, inherited from his service during the Revolution a certain undefined antagonism to military education, and entertained effete ideas with regard to most modern improvements. Three years later, though possessed of ample time and means, his miserable failure to invade Canada proved his total unfitness for elevated military command, whatever might have been his merits in earlier days.

JAMES MADISON, who became President Jefferson's successor, was a statesman of enlarged views. Repeatedly, in his messages to Congress, he urged, with great force and earnestness, the importance of increasing our means for military education, regarding "the advancement of science and the diffusion of information as the best aliment to true liberty;" but, plunged at once into foreign questions of impressment of our seamen, the rights of search, and outrages to neutral commerce, he had little time for personal attention to the Military Academy.

WILLIAM EUSTIS, a physician of Boston, Mass., was appointed March 9, 1809, Secretary of War under the new administration. He had been a surgeon in the Continental Army, and in the expedition of 1786-87 against Shays' insurgents; and was a member of Congress during Jefferson's first term as President. He was a man of moderate capacity; of social temperament; and of narrow prejudices, bred in camp and hospital. He had some knowledge of the Military Academy, having been in Congress during its infancy. As a Continental surgeon, he had been stationed opposite West Point, at the Beverly House, the headquarters of Arnold, whose escape, he often narrated, was through the energy of Corporal Levy, the coxswain of the general's barge, who supposed they were going upon some official business. Arriving on board the Vulture, Arnold offered to make Levy a sergeant-major in the British service, at the same time making some remarks upon the cause of his abandoning the American Army. Levy replied that one coat was enough to wear, whereupon the commander of the Vulture commended his patriotism, treated the barge crew to good fare, and allowed them to return unmolested to West Point.

Secretary Eustis arrived at Washington April 7, 1809, accompanied by Major Swift, of the Engineers, who had known him intimately for some years, and had been requested to aid the new Cabinet officer in becoming acquainted with his duties. On an excursion from Boston to Portsmouth with the doctor, after he probably knew he was to go into Madison's Cabinet, Swift discussed a new formation of the Army, with a Staff Corps, and an enlargement of the Military Academy with a School of Practice by a Corps of Sappers and Miners. "The latter two Dr. Eustis did not approve," thus showing his hostility to the institution at West Point before he had entered upon the duties of the War Department. His subsequent acts, as will presently appear, show that, if possible, he meant to crush it, notwithstanding our increasing dangers made it apparent that in his hands were the successful or disastrous issues of the nation's fate. France had infringed her treaty, burnt our vessels on the high seas, and subjected to capture our commerce with her maritime foe. Great Britain continued to violate our territory, deplete our commerce, impress our seamen, exclude our exports from market, and subject to tribute the staples of our country. Each power, under pretext of retaliating on us for our alleged submission to the other, had carried its injustice and violence beyond all bounds of endurance, and, every possible form of negotiation having failed with both belligerents, nothing seemed left but war to preserve our liberty and honor.

The Academy in 1809 opened about the 1st of April with probably some 30 cadets, as the muster-roll shows 42, present and absent, at the end of the month, which number includes the ten appointed in 1809 before April 14, all of whom were doubtless selected by General Dearborn, as Dr. Eustis did not arrive at Washington till the 7th, and could hardly have become familiar with War Department affairs in a week. Small as was their number to meet the urgent necessity for instructed officers, Secretary Eustis began his administration by an effort to disperse them, degrade them to common laborers, and deprive them of all academic advantages. In a letter to Colonel Williams he says: "My opinion is, that you owe it to yourself, to these young men, and to the public, to take some of them with you to the works at New York. They ought (if there be not an objection, which does not occur to me) to be attached to companies, or at least to be about the works, if it be only that they may see in what manner work is done. And they should live on their pay and rations. More, they ought to put the public to no expense of any kind, either for transportation or quarters, or any other item. Occasionally they ought to be relieved, that all may have an opportunity of learning something, and of rendering some service to the public. However trivial the service, it holds them to their responsibility, and is at times their proper place. I beg you to think of this, and if there be any objections let me know it. Be assured that to learn the young men to subsist on small means is among the greatest services you can render them. They ought also to labor, or at least to be so near to laborers as to be able to work if it should be necessary."

His animus towards the Academy was further shown by crowding out cadets by six companies of New York volunteers, under Colonel Simmons, ordered to take post at West Point; by refusing to appoint young Thompson a cadet, though so strongly urged on the score of humanity to the suffering family of a veteran officer; and by an order to dispense with the services of one of the three instructors appointed by President Jefferson, unless all would consent to live upon the pittance allowed to two. The latter decision was in response to a strong appeal from Colonel Williams, who says: "The accountant having returned Professor Masson's account, although the allowance has for a long time been regularly paid, and the Paymaster having omitted Professor Hassler's name on the pay-rolls and referred him to the War Office, it is my duty to explain their respective demands. . . . Mr. Hassler was employed by the express order of General Dearborn, at $700 per annum, and it was justly considered an acquisition to obtain a man so eminently distinguished for learning and talents on such moderate terms. Mr. Masson has done the duties of Professor of Drawing, as of the French Language, and he had been paid $15 per month, in addition to his pay, for this double duty. It was desirable to have a Professor of Fortification, and generally of the art of the engineers, and in these Mr. Masson excels. It was therefore decided by General Dearborn to have a Professor of Drawing, and relieve Mr. Masson from that duty, on condition of his performing the other duties for the same emoluments hitherto enjoyed. All this arrangement was called temporary, and the payments were a charge on the contingencies of the War Department, but it was considered to continue until due provision was made by law, which it was expected would have been done at the last session, and no doubt will be done at the next.

“I beg your permission to observe that, so long as the duties have been performed by the professors, the faith of the Government is pledged, and the payment is justly due. If it is judged proper to discontinue the payments, it seems reasonable that notice should be previously given, that the duties may discontinue also. Lieutenant Partridge does all his time will permit in aid of the Mathematical branch, but no one man is equal to the whole task, even if he had nothing else to do. Mr. Masson’s lectures are worth far more than his pay. The students are made to write them out, and thus they receive, in regular gradations, all the elements of their art in a manner that no English book I know of could teach. It is condensing all that is known in Europe in foreign languages in systematic form into our own, and when all the courses shall be finished it will make a very valuable work. I have no doubt but, on this representation, you will please to direct the settlement of the debt in the usual way.”

In this connection it is but just to quote from Major Swift’s letter of Aug. 9, 1809, to Colonel Williams, in which he says: “I can’t get the Secretary to do anything for Mrs. Thompson or her son. . . . I have doubts of his agreeing to sanction any accommodation, but I think he will not put any difficulty in the way of the commanding engineer allowing Mrs. Thompson a house and garden, and to take cadet boarders.” Soon after, Mrs. Thompson was permitted to occupy a small wooden building, from which she subsequently removed to the “Knox headquarters,” with the privilege of boarding twelve cadets. This was continued till her death, and to her daughters till Feb. 16, 1875, when the last survivor (Amelia) in her old age relinquished it.

In the absence of Colonel Williams, who was much occupied with his duties as Chief Engineer, particularly in hastening the construction of the defenses of New York Harbor, Lieut. Alden Partridge was in command at West Point. In his report of Sep. 27, 1809, to Colonel Williams, he gives a vivid picture of the disorganization produced by Secretary Eustis's total neglect to provide for the wants of the Academy and support its discipline. He says: "On Monday last, there was a very thin Mathematical Academy; the French was not much better; and no Drawing. Yesterday there was a still less number in the Mathematical Academy, and some of those who did attend did not come into the Academy until about ten o'clock; the Academy of Fortification was similar; the Drawing Academy was also very thin. Having fully considered these circumstances, and being convinced that in the present management of the Academy it is impossible for me to be of that advantage I could wish, I have to request a leave of absence."

Lieutenant Partridge, not obtaining the leave of absence asked, submitted, Oct. 24, 1809, as directed by Colonel Williams, the following very sensible propositions for the consideration of the War Department:—

First. Let no person be appointed a cadet who is under fourteen or over eighteen years of age; nor unless he can produce testimony of his knowledge of the first rules of arithmetic, and with a tolerable handwriting.

Second. Let all the appointments for each year be made in such a manner that all the cadets for that year may join the Academy together at the close of the vacation. (The winter would probably be the most proper time for making the appointments.)

Third. Let the time of remaining at the Academy be limited to four years.

Fourth. Let the cadets be divided into four classes, to remain one year in each class, and let their studies be arranged accordingly.

Fifth. At the end of each term, let there be a general examination of the several classes, when each class, having completed the course of studies assigned, will be advanced one grade forward, and have its place filled by the next lower class, and the lowest class be composed of those newly appointed.

Sixth. After a class has completed the whole course of studies at the Academy, let its members be entitled to receive commissions, if there should be vacancies; if not, let them have the privilege of going upon duty with the Engineer officers, or of being attached to such companies in such tasks as they are judged best able to perform the duties of, until vacancies happen, receiving some additional compensation for their services.

Seventh. If, on the general examination, any one should be found unfit to enter a higher class, and his not being qualified should be owing to his own negligence, let him be dismissed the Academy; if there should be other and better reasons for it, let him remain another year in the reserve class.

Eighth. Let the Superintendent of the Academy, together with the several professors, have the privilege of forming rules and regulations for the internal government of the Academy.

Ninth. Let no cadet receive a commission until he has completed the whole course of studies at the Academy, and in granting commissions let the strictest regard be paid to merit.

“The particular class arrangement of the studies would require some reflection, and belongs more properly to the constitution. Since, however, young persons are better qualified for attending to studies where memory, more than reason, is concerned, it would seem proper that the first two years should be devoted more particularly to the French Language and Drawing, together with the elements of the Mathematics, reserving the higher studies for the last two years, when their age will be rather more mature."

It is presumed that there was no general examination at the end of the academic term of 1809, as, of the seven cadets commissioned this year, all but one were promoted before Dr. Eustis became Secretary of War, and were probably, after their examination in 1808, waiting for vacancies to occur in the Army.

By the beginning of the annual vacation, Secretary Eustis had so thoroughly proved his incompetency for his high office, and had so completely disorganized the Military Academy, that the Engineers were utterly disgusted, and, but for the anticipation of a war, their chief would have resigned, as his authority received no support whatever from the War Department.

With the academic term of 1809 ended the active services of all the heads of the several branches of instruction. Lieutenant Bomford, who taught Practical Pyrotechny, was ordered, Dec. 27, 1809, to New York; Professor Hassler, of the Department of Mathematics, resigned Feb. 14, 1810; Teacher Masson went to Europe on leave of absence, April 15, 1810; and Teacher Zoeller quitted the Department of Drawing April 30, 1810. Till the resignation of Francis D. Masson, March 31, 1812, his brother Florimond did his duties as Teacher of French, but not of Fortification.

FLORIMOND MASSON was the opposite of his brother Francis in appearance, manner, and disposition; was very amiable and a popular teacher, though cadets profited little by his instruction.

The Academy, now under command of Second Lieutenant Sylvanus Thayer, of the Engineers, besides being deprived of nearly all means of instruction, was cut off from every kind of supply, "even to a sheet of paper and a single goose-quill with which to make out the usual muster-roll ;” and officers and cadets were in eternal difficulties in getting their pay and allowances. One of the latter writes, March 18, 1810 : “ I wish they would either put the institution on a respectable footing, or annihilate it at once, for in its present condition it is a disgrace to the United States.” An officer of Engineers, in a letter of April 1, 1810, to Colonel Williams, says : “ You seem somewhat dissatisfied with the Secretary of War, and perhaps for the same reason I might also be a little out of humour. He has changed the institutions of his predecessor, and is not willing we should go on in a style suited to the times and the honour of the country, but what of that? It matters not: we are not to blame who do all we can, and, if they withhold the means, the responsibility must fall upon their shoulders. . . . It is enough that we do all we can for the good of our country, and for our own reputation. . . . Congress makes no preparation for the worst that may happen, but think themselves quite safe in their chimney corners.”

While war was almost upon us, Secretary Eustis was doing his utmost to destroy the Military Academy. Not only did he fail to supply the requisites for educating cadets, not a single new one did he appoint ; and from the few remaining on the rolls he was making constant details for companies and War Department clerks, before they had been taught the rudiments of their profession.

Congress did little better, being chiefly engaged in discussing the removal of the Academy to Washington, for political, not educational, purposes. Till two years later, nothing for the improvement of the Academy was done, though Senator Bradley, instigated by Colonel Williams, had, April 13, 1810, reported a bill for the re-organization of the institution, containing the essential provisions of the subsequent enactment of April 29, 1812.

Colonel Williams favored the removal of the Academy, not to Washington, but to Staten Island, New York Harbor, as will appear from the following memorandum given by him, Jan. 26, 1810, to the Hon. De Witt Clinton, then a member of the United States House of Representatives:—

“Two questions relative to the Military Academy are now before Congress: first, to remove it to Washington, and, second, to retain it at West Point.

“Like many other cases in this contradictory world, the possession of the object makes but a small part of the motive on either side. Could the city of Washington be bolstered up by the transfer of all the public institutions in the Union, so as to force it to become a large and populous city, an end would be answered, whatever might be the fate of the institutions.

“In like manner, there may be local considerations respecting West Point, and these considerations are very natural to the New York Representatives in Congress. But if it were established anywhere else within the State, this object would be equally assured, and the New York Representatives would feel bound to obey any impulse given by the government of their own State. When the Secretary of War passed through New York, the Governor intimated to him a choice of three propositions, provided the Legislature should concur:—

“First. If the United States will pay for the land lately purchased adjoining Signal Hill on Staten Island, the State of New York will make them a present of all the works as far as they are constructed. Or,

“Second. If the United States will pay for the works, the State of New York will make them a present of the land, and, in either case, cede the jurisdiction in the usual way. Or,

“Third. If the United States will establish the Military Academy there, the State of New York will present works and land gratis, and cede as before proposed. This would be in effect giving the whole cost of their works as an endowment to the Academy, for, as the works would have cost the United States what they have cost the State, this money is a direct present, and in its application to the Academy operates directly where it will be immediately wanted.

“The advantages to the institution are :—

“First. All experiments in gunnery may be made on the beach, which gives a range of two miles or more. At West Point, there being only mountains and a river, no range can be had.

“Second. A good soil for complete vegetable maintenance, and the vicinity to a good market, besides a rich country all around, and decent society. West Point is grossly deficient in all these particulars.

“Third. A laboratory might be established here to supply all the United States; the fortifications going on would be a source of practical instruction; and all experiments of every kind, as well as every species of astronomical, geometrical, and maritime observations, might be pursued.

“Fourth. The Academy would become known throughout the United States. At West Point it is as completely obscure as if it were placed on the north side of the Ohio.

“Fifth. Many officers might be made masters of nautical astronomy while pursuing their other studies in the harbor. There never has been a Navy officer at the Academy at West Point since its establishment.

“In short, this place possesses all the advantages of a salubrious climate, — warm in winter and cool in summer, being covered by high lands to the northwest and open to sea breezes. The economy that might be exercised in constructing works, under the eye and with the aid of this Academy, with its discipline and the strength of the troops that might be attached to it, would considerably reduce the expense, and no expense would be required here that would not be required to make the Academy what it ought to be if it were to remain at West Point, for there is not one stone upon another that must not be taken down if the works are to be rebuilt on the same site; and there is but one building, except the stores, that would require less money for a complete repair than the cost of a new one of equal capacity, and this one is but a wooden frame one story high."

Governor Tompkins, of New York, March 23, 1810, notified Colonel Williams that the Legislature of the State had passed a concurrent resolution requesting him to report, at their next session, whether any and what arrangements could be made with the General Government respecting a cession by the State of New York to the United States for the works of defense on Staten Island. Colonel Williams replied that the act of cession must be absolute before Congress would take any positive action respecting the removal of the Military Academy to Staten Island.

While Congress was talking much, and, like the Secretary of War, doing nothing, for the advancement of the institution, the Academy was re-opened early in April, 1810, with only fifteen cadets, and no other instructors than the temporary Teacher of French and Lieutenant Partridge, the Acting Assistant Professor of Mathematics, who was in command during Colonel Williams's absence upon the defenses of New York Harbor, which he was pushing forward with all vigor, notwithstanding the continual obstruction and annoyances of the Secretary of War.

Colonel Williams, after earnest appeal and much persistent effort, succeeded in extorting Secretary Eustis's approval, April 30, 1810, of the following regulations relative to the Military Academy at West Point:—

“1. From and after the 4th of July, 1810, no cadet shall be admitted into the Military Academy under the age of fifteen or above that of twenty years.

“2. Every cadet appointed in the service of the United States shall subscribe an engagement to serve four years unless sooner discharged.

“3. The qualifications for admission into the Academy, in addition to those of age before mentioned, shall be, that the candidate is well versed in the English language, in writing and arithmetic, that he is of good moral character and of sound constitution.

“4. Furloughs shall not be granted excepting in case of sickness, domestic casualties, or at the request of parents or guardians; and when on furlough (except in time of vacation by the rules of the Academy) pay and emoluments shall cease.

“5. When cadets shall become candidates for commissions, a certificate from the Superintendent, that they have been duly examined and are found to excel, will give them preference.

“6. Notice of appointments will be given to the commanding officer, and, if those attached shall not join within a reasonable time, they shall be reported absent without leave.

“7. A uniform shall be established by the Superintendent, with the approbation of the Secretary of War, for all cadets attached to the Academy, without regard to their respective corps.

“8. Interior regulations shall be made by the Superintendent for the time being, provided that no existing regulation be altered or counteracted without special order of the Commandant of the Corps of Engineers.

“9. While the Academy remains at West Point, a vacation shall take place annually on the 15th of December, and terminate on the 15th of March following."

Before the ink of Secretary Eustis's official signature to these wise and needful regulations was fairly dry, he, without consultation with the Superintendent of the Academy, began making, from the handful of students at the institution, fresh details of cadets for War Department clerks, and to join companies, not to serve, as might reasonably have been expected, as subaltern officers, but as private soldiers. In an order of May 18, 1810, to Colonel Williams, the Secretary says: "After the cadets shall have completed (?) their academical education, it is intended that they shall be attached to companies to perform duty as soldiers in the line, in order to their becoming candidates for promotion to commissions. By courtesy, cadets are generally allowed to quarter and mess with the officers of the company to which they are attached."

Colonel Williams, May 25, 1810, under the authority given by the Secretary of War, April 30, 1810, established the following "Internal Regulations for the Military Academy," and directed that all others not in conformity to these should be null and void:—

"First. Every cadet attached to the Military Academy, previous to his being considered a candidate for a commission, shall have completed the following course of studies, viz. :—

"In Mathematics he shall be required to be well versed in Arithmetic, Logarithms, the Elements of Algebra, Geometry, Trigonometry, Mensuration of heights and distances, Planometry, Stereometry, Surveying, Artificer's work, and Conic Sections.

"In French, to pronounce the language tolerably, and to translate from English into French, and from French into English, with accuracy.

"In military duty, to understand the manual exercise with the musket, the management of the field-piece, and the various evolutions of the infantry and artillery perfectly.

“Second. Whenever a cadet shall have completed the above course of studies, he shall be entitled to a certificate to that effect signed by the commanding officer, after which, if he wishes, he shall be excused from attending the Academy, but may pursue such studies as he chooses at his quarters.

“Third. The hours for attending the Academy, for studying in quarters, for parades and drills, and for all other duties upon which the cadets may be called, shall be directed by the commanding officer, and his orders shall have equal force with these regulations.

“Fourth. All excuses for absences from duty must be made immediately and in writing. If reasonable, they will be accepted.

“Fifth. All unnecessary noise in or near any quarters in coming to or going from parade, or on or near the parade ground, and the discharging of firearms within the public walls (without special permission), are strictly prohibited.

“Sixth. The commanding officer shall be at liberty to appoint any cadet to do the duty of adjutant, and each cadet in turn shall do the duty of officer of the day in such manner as shall be directed.

“Seventh. Every cadet who shall obtain leave of absence shall at his departure and return report himself to the officer of the day.

“Eighth. Days for uniform parades shall be appointed by the commanding officers, and every cadet on such days will be required to appear on parade in the uniform of the Academy complete, unless specially excused.

“Ninth. All conduct contrary to the principles of military discipline, though not particularly mentioned, is to be considered contrary to the regulations of the Military Academy.

“ Tenth. Every cadet who shall knowingly violate any of the above regulations shall, for the first offense, be privately admonished by the commanding officer; for the second offense he shall be publicly admonished; for the third offense he shall be publicly reprimanded; for the fourth offense he shall be confined to his quarters for a term of time not exceeding eight days; and for the fifth offense he shall be stricken from the roll of the Academy as unworthy of being a member.

“ Eleventh. Any cadet who shall wilfully be guilty of disobedience of any lawful order shall be immediately dismissed; but, previously to his dismissal, he shall, upon his requisition, be allowed a court of inquiry into the facts, and shall be heard in his defense. The court shall be appointed by the commanding officer, and consist of one or more commissioned officers, as may be deemed expedient; and in case of a commissioned officer, other than the commanding officer, being present, three cadets may form the court, and report the facts, but without an opinion, unless otherwise ordered by the commanding officer. In like manner, a court of inquiry into any occurrence may be ordered by the commanding officer, as occasion may require.

“ Twelfth. In all cases of dismissal, a report shall be made to the Secretary of War, that he may assign such duties as he may think proper to the dismissed cadet at any other post or place.

“ Thirteenth. Cadets are by law liable to perform any duty that a soldier may be commanded to perform, and, that there may be no misapprehension of this obligation, it is here declared that they are liable to be ordered on all kinds of military duty by the commanding officer, as well as upon any other duty that may tend to increase their general knowledge.

“Fourteenth. The strictest attention to the foregoing duties at the times specified will be required; and when on duty of any kind, the accurate observance of that duty is hereby specially enjoined under the penalty provided for the disobedience of orders.

“Fifteenth. The foregoing Interior Regulations, being authorized by the Eighth Article of the Regulations for the Military Academy established by the Secretary of War on the 30th day of April, 1810, are to be taken as part of Regulations, and have full and equal force with them.”

Colonel Williams, in the 13th paragraph of the above Regulations, felt bound to give a qualified sanction to Secretary Eustis's views of the legal obligations of cadets. The latter, to leave no doubt of his mean intentions, writes, June 4, 1810, to Colonel Williams: “It is intended as a general regulation, admitting of such exceptions as circumstances may render expedient, that, when the cadets have completed their academical education, they shall be attached to companies of the respective corps in which they are destined for commissions; that they shall wear precisely the same uniform (the cloth may be of superior quality) with the company to which they are attached, — the same arms, and perform all the duties of privates, with such exceptions and exemptions as the commanding officer may permit; that they may also perform the duties of corporals and sergeants, if found qualified; and that, when they shall be nominated for commissions, their appointments be considered and styled promotions.”

Colonel Williams, in commenting on the above, says, in substance: “The law contemplates a cadet being above a sergeant; the only questions are his capacity and the inexperience of youth. Cadets who have gone through a military education, and performed the duties of cadet company officers, ought not to be placed under the command of non-commissioned officers; and, in general terms, they should be placed above soldiers, and their position be dignified as candidates for commissions. When 'off duty, let the cadet mess with officers, and be considered as what his name imports, a younger brother.'"

Colonel Williams soon after, June 13, 1810, in writing to the President on matters pertaining to the United States Military Philosophical Society, says in his letter, of which only a fragment is to be found: "I would not trouble you again on the subject of the Military Academy, if it were not to express the regret arising from two circumstances which I formerly intimated to you, and which I think are now clearly ascertained, by the repeated failure of every attempt in its favour, to be decided facts. First. Those members of both houses of Congress who wish to augment the establishments at Washington are determined to oppose everything relating to the institution, unless its removal to that city be a preliminary condition. Second. The opposite party are equally determined to oppose everything relative to the institution, if it be not absolutely fixed elsewhere as forever to prevent its removal to that city. . . . I communicated to the Secretary of War, some time since, a proposition made to me by Governor Tompkins [the cession of the State works and land at the eastern end of Staten Island, the details of which have been before stated]. . . . But unfortunately the Legislature of New York, whose assent to the Governor's proposition is necessary before it can be acted upon by the Government of the United States, will not be in session till February, and Congress must dissolve on the 4th of March. From these and other considerations, I totally despair of any alteration in the system that will raise the Academy to that state which the honour of the nation and the advantage of the Army indispensably require. And convinced as I am that under its present want of necessary buildings, requisite professors, and almost everything that should constitute a seminary of military science, neither benefit to the public nor honour to myself can be derived from it, I hope to be permitted to view the present session as the last in which I shall be required personally to superintend this inadequate establishment. I think myself bound to express my sentiments thus early, that they may not appear hereafter to be devoid of due reflection. But I beseech you to be persuaded, sir, that, in every way that I can aid the administration and serve the public, I shall always be ready, within the compass of my limited talents, to testify the warmest zeal. On the other hand, whenever it appears to my mind impossible to render such services as the end in view indispensably requires, or to give such satisfaction to the Government and the public at large as from ostensible circumstances they might reasonably expect, I shall feel it to be my duty to acquiesce in my inability rather than vainly persist in useless efforts."

Colonel Williams's duties as Chief Engineer continuing to require his being absent most of his time from West Point, he issued, June 17, 1810, the following Engineer and Academy order: —

"With the arrival of a Captain of Engineers at West Point, on whom the command will devolve in the absence of the Colonel Commandant, it is necessary to establish some explanatory rules of distinction between the interior government of the Academy and the general exterior command: —

"First. All the rules established for the particular administration of academical superintendence necessarily fall under the professors' charge, and of course Lieutenant Partridge, the chief professor, must be supported, and in no instance interrupted, in enforcing the execution of them, or in giving theoretical or practical instruction to the cadets.

“Second. On the other hand, whatever relates to the command and police of the post will naturally fall under the direction of the superior officer. These outlines would be sufficient for a complete understanding if the duties did not in some measure so coincide as to make a line of distinction difficult; but the Colonel Commandant relies upon the judgment of the commanding officer, which, joined to the disposition of the professors generally, will, it is presumed, insure a complete coöperation. It must be understood, however, that while officers of the corps are engaged as professors, they must be considered as staff officers, and not liable to any military order which might interrupt or impede their academical duties; but this is not to exempt them from obeying all orders which the police and good government of the post, and gradations of military rank, may render necessary.

“As cases may arise where a court martial may be requisite, and as it is desirable that prisoners should not be kept long in confinement without trial, a standing court martial is hereby appointed, of which Captain Gratiot is president, Lieutenant Partridge and Lieutenant Thayer members, to sit occasionally on their own adjournments for the trial of such offenses as may occur until they shall be discharged. The president will appoint a judge-advocate occasionally. Captain Gratiot takes command of the post, its police, and government of the men, this day, notwithstanding the presence of the Colonel Commandant. He will please, however, to cause all daily reports to be communicated to him.”

This order gave great umbrage to Lieutenant Partridge, who, July 8, 1810, in an insubordinate temper, addressed the following communication to the Chief Engineer:—

“Agreeably to your request, I have the honor to make known to you the conditions upon which I am willing to continue my duties in the Academy in the same manner I have hitherto done.

“First. In the absence of yourself, all Academy regulations, and also the cadets, to be exclusively and in every respect under my direction.

“Second. The above being established, I will hold myself responsible for the improvement of the cadets in all their pursuits, both theoretical and practical, and also for the due enforcing of the regulations established for the government of the Academy.

“Should the above conditions be thought inadmissible, I would beg leave to be excused from all further duties in the Academy, and would take the liberty to request leave of absence until the 30th of September next, during which time I can make my arrangements either to return and do duty in the corps or resign.”

In reply to this, Colonel Williams, the next day, administered the following very proper rebuke:—

“I have received your letter of yesterday, stating ‘the conditions on which you are willing to continue your duties in the Academy in the same manner you have hitherto done,’ which you say is, ‘in my absence, all the academic regulations, and also the cadets, to be exclusively and in every respect under your direction.’ . . . Before I answer this demand, so positively expressed, I wish to call your recollection to the attention I have uniformly paid to you in everything relating to the Academy and this post, and such has been my confidence in your talents, zeal, and industry that I have thought the institution much benefited by these arrangements. If an officer senior to you had not been sent hither, no alteration would have been necessary, and I should have continued you in command with great satisfaction.

“The arrival of Captain Gratiot, however, alters this state of things, and the rights of seniority make him the commanding officer, but, expressly to give you satisfaction, I made additional regulations and separated the academical duties from those of the post, in the nature of staff appointments, thereby preserving to you the exclusive direction of the institution. These regulations were shown to you previously to their promulgation, and, hearing no objection, I concluded that the effect would perfect harmony. You now ask me to deprive Captain Gratiot of this right, and to grant you what the rules of the Army absolutely forbid, for, if you were to have the exclusive command of the cadets, there would be left nothing above a corporal’s duty for Captain Gratiot to perform.

“Respecting the leave of absence you ask, I have so repeatedly pointed out to you the impossibility of granting it without deviating from what I esteem my duty, that I did not expect a repetition of the request, and you will do me the justice to allow that my refusal, by its nature, involved a compliment to your usefulness. The health of Mrs. Williams prevents me from giving customary attention to business. I therefore request that, if you deem an answer necessary, you would let it lie over two or three days, and then make it in writing. This delay may aid your reflections, and relieve my domestic anxiety; but it would be more agreeable to hear nothing more on the subject.”

Lieutenant Partridge, instead of manfully acknowledging his error, procured a surgeon’s certificate of disability, which devolved his duties upon Lieutenant Thayer. On the 11th of July, Colonel Williams issued the following order:—

“The doctor having certified that Lieutenant Partridge is very much affected with a febrile disease, and rendered thereby unfit for duty, he is for the present excused from the professorship, and Captain Gratiot will take upon himself the superintendence of the Academy, directing such of the cadets to assist in the duties as he, in conjunction with Lieutenant Thayer, may judge most capable to teach the several classes."

Accordingly, Cadets Boisaubin and Loomis were detailed as instructors to the first class; and Cadets Fanning and Larrabee to the second class.

By midsummer of 1810, Secretary Eustis, by his continual details of cadets for company and other duties, had left so few at West Point that, except in name, the Academy had virtually ceased to exist; and discipline was so palsied that Colonel Williams had to resort to summary measures to keep up even its semblance. He reports to the Secretary of War, July 18, 1810: "By virtue of authority vested in me as Superintendent, I have dismissed Cadet Burchstead from the Academy for committing violations of the regulations of the institution by assault and battery. Being also charged with 'mutiny by opposing the Officer of the Day with naked arms, — a military offense, and cognizable by a court martial, — I have directed him to proceed (under continual arrest) to Fort Jay [now Columbus] for trial." Notwithstanding all this, Secretary Eustis allowed Burchstead to continue a cadet, and subsequently, March 1, 1811, commissioned him an Ensign in the Second Regiment of Infantry.

Worn out by the apathy of Congress and the criminal perverseness of Secretary Eustis, Colonel Williams, writing Sep. 15, 1810, to Mr. Jefferson about one of his cadet protégés, pours out his heart in lamentations over the noble institution founded by the ex-President: "I wish I could make use of your voice to excite our General Legislature to some attention to the Military Academy. We want military more than any other description of talent, . . . and yet, strange to tell! we are cold, chilling cold, upon every subject relative to military instruction. Nine tenths of Congress seem to me not only cold but blind, stone-blind, to the true interests of our nation on the score of its defense. I have been engaged eight years in the embryo of a military seminary, and have at last barely brought it into existence. It lives indeed, but, in comparison to what it ought to be, it is a puny, rickety child.

“I am tired, my dear sir, heartily tired; and although I never wished to terminate my labors but with my life, I must in future be excused from meddling with the Military Academy, unless, by some means or other, I can see a prospect of producing some benefit to my country, and, pardon my vanity, some honour to myself.”

Secretary Eustis, not content with destroying the Military Academy, proposed also to destroy the Corps of Engineers, by filling an existing vacancy in it by an appointment from without. On this, Colonel Williams, Oct. 3, 1810, wrote to the Secretary as follows:—

“In consequence of your remark this morning, and to confirm my statement in reply, I take the liberty of transmitting an extract from the law, which shows the impossibility of filling any vacancy that has occurred, or may hereafter occur, in the Corps of Engineers, from without, the law expressly requiring that all promotions be made in the corps.

“The Corps of Engineers has been made what it is by a spirit of emulation. Would it be expedient to destroy that spirit by disappointing the hope which is doubtless the source of such emulation? Could we expect to produce the officers we now have, if their hopes of promotion were to be so unexpectedly cut off?

“I have added the 63d Article of War, to show that all transfers must regard rank.”

Secretary Eustis's contempt for all official courtesy and propriety, and utter disregard of the discipline of the Military Academy, will appear from the following letter of Nov. 5, 1810, written by his sanction to the Superintendent of the institution by Cadet Villard:—

“On my arrival at Washington, I called on the Secretary of War and told him that, as I had gone through my studies at West Point, likewise rather tired of the place after being there four years (not mentioning, however, the difficulty that I had), I requested him to order me on some duty at Washington, which he granted without the least hesitation; and, as he seems very well disposed in my favor, I will thank you, if convenient, to send me a statement of my conduct while on the Point, together with the proficiency that I have made in my studies while I have had the honor of being under your command.

“I am writing in the War Department, and, agreeable to the orders of the Secretary, I report myself to you on command at this place.”

Cadet Ormond Marsh, Nov. 12, 1810, in like manner, without the military formality of making an application through his commanding officer, writes to him from Norfolk, Va.:—

“The day after I had the honor of addressing to you my last letter, I called upon the Secretary of War again, and he gave me permission to repair to this place and wait for orders; and directed me to report myself to Major Nicoll, which I did accordingly. This, I presume, will be sufficient to have me reported absent with leave on the muster rolls for November.”

From the demagogue, practicing every species of official discourtesy, bent upon the destruction of our sole means of military instruction, regardless of our dangers from foreign war, and insensible to the earnest efforts of a noble subordinate, it is pleasing to turn to the enlightened estimate of such a soldier, statesman, and jurist as Brockholst Livingston, of the United States Supreme Court, who, in a private letter of Nov. 11, 1810, to Colonel Williams, says:—

“I return your statement with a great many thanks for your politeness in letting me look over it, and for the pleasure which its perusal has afforded me. I have long thought a Military Academy absolutely indispensable in this country, and I think the public greatly indebted to your zeal and exertions for placing the one we have on so useful and respectable a footing. I hope you will encounter no difficulty in obtaining the improvements your experience has shown to be necessary, and that, while we are enjoying the benefit resulting from such an institution, we may not be unmindful of the gentleman without whose intelligence and perseverance we should still have been without it.”

The Military Academy, for want of cadets, having practically ceased to exist about the middle of July, 1810, no general examination could take place at the end of the academic year, a year with that of 1816,—for causes to be hereafter explained,—which are the solitary blanks in its long existence, without any graduates. During this year but two cadets were appointed,—William Sumter, January 18, and Alexander R. Thompson, Nov. 21, 1810,—both doubtless being Presidential appointments, or forced upon Secretary Eustis by peculiar circumstances; for, out of 206 authorized, these two were the only cadet appointments made till after the passage of the law of April 29, 1812, re-organizing the Academy. The first named cadet, a relative of General Sumter, then a Senator in Congress from South Carolina, probably never received a day's instruction at West Point, for, till long after the Academy expired, he was on duty upon the fortifications of Charleston Harbor; and in like manner the second, who was commissioned Jan. 3, 1812, could have received only private lessons from some professor or officer remaining at West Point after his appointment, as during 1811 there was no academic term.

Colonel Williams, in his annual report of November, 1810, made the following statement:—

“To have a comprehensive idea of the patriotic views of the Government in establishing a Corps of Engineers, and causing that corps to constitute a Military Academy, it is necessary to recur to first principles, both as they relate to the political objects of such an institution and the branches of science which are the indispensable sources of the military art.

“Experience, the best of all possible instructors, has taught us that our harbors ought to be fortified. . . . The art of fortification, however simple it may seem to a superficial beholder, is so based on mathematical, mechanical, and philosophical principles that errors are liable to occur at every step, which, without a scientific guide, would tend to destroy the object aimed at. . . . These considerations, and the importance of having a Seminary of Military Science, doubtless induced the President to propose, and the Congress to establish, a Corps of Engineers, causing that corps to constitute a Military Academy.

“But the art of fortification alone cannot fulfil the object contemplated. Efficient military science requires a larger scale; it requires that practice should go hand in hand with theory, and that soldiers as well as officers should know the principles of their profession, and by that knowledge become sensible of the high importance of the duty exacted of them.

“As much as the principles of our Revolution and the temper of an independent republic oppose the propriety of a standing army in time of peace, so much do common sense and the same spirit of independence encourage the idea that we ought to be always ready to raise an efficient force with the least inconvenience, and with the greatest possible promptitude ; but, above all, that we should have a source of military science, forming a centre around which an army would grow by radiations to every point of the Union. . . .

“ Now that war has become a complicated art, it requires study as well as practice to become a soldier, and a man to direct soldiers effectually should be well acquainted with the principles of science to guide his military operations, especially as, whenever we are attacked, we shall have to oppose veterans who have become proficient in the most effectual of all schools, — actual war.

“ It seems, then, that while a large standing army in time of peace is universally reprobated, the means of raising an effectual one upon any sudden emergency must be as univervally desired. . . .

“ The Military Academy as such comprehends only what may be taught by its professors ; but a great mass of military knowledge, theoretical and practical, is doubtless spread over these United States.

“ To collect this into one focus, from which it may again emanate in proper directions, is to preserve for future generations the science which their fathers have obtained by dear experience on fields of glory ; it seemed therefore proper to form a repository for this scattered mass of knowledge, and the Corps of Engineers have laid the foundation of a Society for Promoting Military Science by entering into certain preliminary articles ; and to give it consistence a constitution has been made, under which they hope to associate the most respectable characters of their country. The society has presumed to request the President of the United States to become its patron. . . . It will become an immediate object to join to the institution the most respectable military and scientific characters of our country ; and before all the veterans of our Revolutionary contest are gone from this world, it is hoped that the knowledge resulting from their honourable experience will be saved from oblivion, and secured among the archives of the society."

The United States Military Philosophical Society was founded at West Point, Nov. 12, 1802, for the objects above stated. Colonel Williams became its president, and so continued till his death. The officers of Engineers, professors of the Military Academy, and many distinguished savants of America and Europe were its members. President Jefferson was its patron, and took much interest in its proceedings.

Colonel Williams, after suggesting such reforms in the Military Academy as experience had dictated, concluded his report by saying : " To put the whole of the requisites here detailed into one concise point of view, they have been digested in the form of a bill to amend the act of March 16, 1802," which is essentially the same as embodied in the after-enactment of April 29, 1812.

President Madison, on taking the helm of state, March 4, 1809, found the United States involved in disputes with the British Government concerning the impressment of our seamen, the searching of our vessels, and restrictions on our commerce. He had tried persuasion, admonition, remonstrance, argument, and even concession ; but all alike proved unavailing with Great Britain, whose sole rule of conduct was her own interest and convenience. His efforts produced no other effect than to augment the evils they were designed to remove ; the appetite of the aggressor grew with what it fed upon ; and Britain's insolence increased with her power. War was inevitable ; and Secretary Eustis, at last alarmed at his fearful responsibility, and doubtless roused from his torpor by the President, wrote to Colonel Williams, Nov. 30, 1810 : —

“The subject of the Military Academy will be recommended for the consideration of Congress by the President. An extension of the establishment, to embrace a branch of the present or the institution of another academy at the seat of government, will be recommended. The President, and, I may add, the whole executive, coincide most entirely in the opinion I have ever entertained of the usefulness and importance of this branch of instruction; and, from the favourable opinions which I have observed in the members of the Legislature, I entertain strong hopes that adequate provision will be made. [Honest! honest Iago!]

“Whenever the subject shall be taken up by a committee, you will be informed, and in the mean time, revolving the subject in your own mind, you can be prepared to give the detail of effecting the establishment of two schools or academies under one system and one direction.”

Immediately after the receipt of the above, Colonel Williams wrote, Dec. 5, 1810, to Governor Tompkins, of New York: —

“Inclosed are copies of two letters from the Secretary of War, which I do not communicate officially because they do not bear the marks of such an expectation; but I think it essential that you should be previously informed of the intention of the President of the United States, in order that, when you see his message, you may, if you please, reserve a place in the speech you will make at the opening of the Legislature, in which coincident observations might come in naturally and of course.

“In my answer to the Secretary, I have said that ‘in mentioning two academies I presume the site of Staten Island might still be understood to be eligible for one, in case the government of the State should propose acceptable terms.’ What I am most afraid of is the etiquette of each party declining to be the first proposer ; if this should be persisted in, the business must be lost. What would be the impropriety of your State saying at once that, in case the United States will lay out, on the same ground, an expense equivalent to what the State has expended there in permanent military establishments, then in that case the sum so laid out shall be considered as a reimbursement to the State of the cost of the fortifications as far as they have progressed? It may not be necessary to designate the Military Academy, provided the designation does not exclude that establishment ; but I do not mean to dictate to you. I know your disposition to further the views you have already suggested, and I rely on such means as you may think advisable. A proposition that only requires assent may be acted upon this session ; but there will be no time, after your Legislature meets, for any discussion in Congress.”

Governor Tompkins replied, Dec. 8, 1810, as follows : —

“I do not much approve the idea, suggested by the Secretary of War, of having two seminaries under one system and direction. Jealousies about the patronage which each may receive from Government, and about supposed partialities in appointments from among the young men of each seminary, and the rivalry which will subsist between the pupils educated at different seminaries, will not only furnish the grounds of numerous duels when they meet in the Army, but will also draw a more distinct line in that profession between Northerly and Southerly men and Northerly and Southerly interests. However, anything rather than the Academy with its present endowment and conveniences.”

President Madison’s message, above alluded to, was communicated to Congress Dec. 5, 1810. In this able state paper he, with great power and earnestness, sets forth the usefulness and necessity of a properly organized Military Academy, to teach the art of war with little expense to the nation, and no danger to the liberties of the people. He says:—

“In the midst of uncertainties necessarily connected with the great interests of the United States, prudence requires a continuance of our defensive and precautionary arrangements. . . .

“Experience has left no doubt either of the necessity or of the efficacy of competent military skill in those portions of an army, in fitting it for the final duties which it may have to perform.

“The Corps of Engineers, with the Military Academy, are entitled to the early attention of Congress. The buildings, at the seat fixed by law for the present Academy, are so far in decay as not to afford the necessary accommodation. But a revision of the law is recommended, principally with a view to a more enlarged cultivation and diffusion of the advantages of such institutions by providing professorships for all the necessary branches of military instruction, and by the establishment of an additional academy at the seat of government or elsewhere. The means by which wars, as well for defense as for offense, are now carried on, render these schools of the more scientific operations an indispensable part of every adequate system. Even among nations whose large standing armies and frequent wars afford every other opportunity of instruction, these establishments are found to be indispensable for the due attainment of the branches of military science which require a regular course of study and experiment. In a government happily without the other opportunities, seminaries where the elementary principles of the art of war can be taught without actual war, and without the expense of extensive and standing armies, have the precious advantage of uniting an essential preparation against an external danger with a scrupulous regard to internal safety. In no other way, probably, can a provision of equal efficacy for the public defense be made at so little expense, or more consistently with the public liberty."

The committee of the United States House of Representatives to which this part of the President's Message was referred, through its chairman, Hon. Peter B. Porter, of the State of New York, requested, Dec. 20, 1810, the views of Colonel Williams. Unfortunately, only fragments of his reply are to be found, the Colonel's letter-books having been lost or destroyed. We gather the following from a few loose scraps filed with his papers: —

"The Corps of Engineers and Military Academy were so closely connected by the peace establishment of 1802 as to identify them as one, of which West Point was made the permanent station. By the strict literal construction of this law, it was a school for the science of an engineer, and for the use of engineers alone; but the interpretation of the law has constituted it a school for the instruction of all cadets of the Army. To effect the latter purpose, a body of professors ought to be attached, since the dispersion of officers of Engineers on their various duties, along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, of itself annihilates the Academy, if its professors are solely the Engineers.

"The post of West Point was probably chosen because it was public property, the storehouse of Revolutionary relics, and supposed to have ample buildings upon it; but the state of the buildings was unknown, for many were uninhabitable at the time, and never were in proper repair. Since 1802 more buildings have been pulled down for fear of falling, or have been demolished by the wind, than now exist, and those standing are not worth the expense of repair. West Point, therefore, as a site for the Academy, has no advantages on the score of buildings ; for gunnery it has no range, except the river, constantly filled with sailing craft ; its climate, delightful in summer, is extremely rigorous in winter ; its markets are distant and expensive ; and the comforts of society are as unattainable as on the summits of the Alleghanies.

“There would be little if any opposition to a removal of the Academy from West Point, if gentlemen were agreed, or if they were indifferent, as to the site ; in either case, the disadvantages of West Point would be readily conceded. To conciliate opinions, two academies have been suggested, one at Washington and one elsewhere, both to be governed by one system and under one direction.

“This idea may be considered in two points of view : As two separate and distinct academies, embracing all points of instruction in each one, although similar to each other in system and under one direction ; or as one and the same academy, but divided in such manner that one shall be preparatory to admission into the other, that is, one to be composed of the two minor and the other of the two superior classes, according to the division usual in our universities.

“According to the first view, if one Academy were established in the District of Columbia and the other in the State of New York, each one forming a perfect system, it would seem to indicate a view of assembling the Southern military youth in one, and the Northern in the other. But experience has shown that Northern military youth bear a proportion of four to one, as proved by the graduations from the Academy. Besides, the most affluent cadets would naturally seek admission to the Academy at the seat of government, as the more fashionable and favoured one.

“That seminaries of learning thrive best at the North would seem to be indicated by the greater number and prosperity of them in the States north of the District of Columbia, at which the Southern youth are in a great measure educated. This fact, however, would operate equally against both propositions.

“In all military establishments there is an esprit de corps which is an unsocial and an invidious sentiment if carried into private life, but is the germ of military ambition, fully balancing the individual mischief that it has in some instances occasioned. Now, an esprit de corps existing in a Southern institution, and also in a Northern one at the same time, would be like drawing a line of perpetual jealousy and perhaps of enmity between the students at each of them. But it may be said that the Northern military students being greater in number will have a tendency to correct this jealousy by being a majority even in the Southern institution, and it seems reasonable that, should both be alike composed in this respect, the evil would be diminished. Whether the Northern youth would be in the majority could be learned only by experience.

“The Military Academy will require an immediate disbursement of money for academical buildings, apparatus, library, ordnance, and various supplies, which must be alike in both. If it be difficult to obtain a sufficient appropriation to effect this upon a proper scale for one, it must be twice as difficult to do it for two. Halving the appropriations would render both institutions inefficient, and be a literal waste of money.

“There is one point of view which must not be lost sight of in considering the case of the Military Academy, — the difference between the apparent and real expense. If the cost of the establishment of the Corps of Engineers were to be chargeable to that institution, it would be unjust, for the Engineers, as such, have performed practical duties to the full value of their pay and subsistence. In like manner the pay and subsistence of the cadets would equally take place if they were all with their companies. So that the cost of the Military Academy, as such, is only the pay of professors, and the cost of apparatus, library, etc., which amounts to a mere trifle.

“According to the second view, if the Military Academy were to be one homogeneous body, but divided into two minor and two major classes, the former to be established in the State of New York and the other in the District of Columbia, then all the Southern youth must necessarily pass through the Northern seminary, and all the Northern youth would go ultimately through the Southern one, while the professors in the higher branches of military science need only attend the establishment at the seat of government. There would be a saving of one set of professors in this mode, and the apprehensions of jealousy would subside, because each student, as such, would have equal interest in, and attachment to, both institutions.

“This division would make the primary institution an elementary school in mathematics, languages, drawing, etc., such as is to be found in almost every town where any education can be obtained, and the institution therefore would not rise to any preëminence. It would be much the same thing as saying that no student should be admitted into the Military Academy till after he had gone through certain studies, which should be such as the primary school is to consist of. In short, it would be precisely the distinction that now exists between the city schools and the university. The only apprehension in this point of view is, whether the Government would be induced to support, at its expense, such a school as is common elsewhere. There would therefore be a well-grounded apprehension that the Northern school would dwindle from its imperfect state at the outset to absolute nonentity, and be abandoned. This, therefore, comes to the proposition of having but one institution, and that one to be at the seat of government."

The Senate, Jan. 8, 1811, reported a bill providing for the removal of the Military Academy to Staten Island, but after undergoing various amendments it was indefinitely postponed by the House of Representatives, March 3, 1811, thereby fortunately leaving the institution where it was originally established. West Point, as the site of the Military Academy, has its disadvantages, especially the want of available level space for buildings, drills, and the various practical exercises; but it would have been a great calamity to have removed it to Staten Island, near the temptations of a great city, and still more to Washington, where politicians would have constantly interfered with its discipline, and society interrupted its winter studies. When too late, March 30, 1811, the State of New York passed an act for the cession of the eastern end of Staten Island for the site of the Military Academy.

Congress, Jan. 22, 1811, passed an act for the appointment of three commissioners to settle the exterior line of the public land at West Point with the adjoining proprietor, Thomas North. The report of these commissioners was subsequently, Jan. 5, 1813, approved.

Of the few remaining cadets, nearly all of whom were on furlough, on command, and absent without leave, there were eighteen commissioned, without any examination, March 1, 1811; and one, doing duty as a clerk in the War Department, resigned April 1, 1811.

Though Congress, in its last short session, had failed to carry out the President's earnest recommendation respecting the Military Academy, it was hardly to be expected that, on the verge of hostilities with a powerful nation, one of his chosen Cabinet ministers should have totally neglected his duty to his chief to forward to the utmost his clearly expressed wishes. Writing, Nov. 30, 1810, to Colonel Williams, Secretary Eustis had said: "The subject of the Military Academy will be recommended for the consideration of Congress by the President, who coincides, and, I may add, the whole executive coincide, most entirely in the opinion I have ever entertained of the usefulness and importance of this branch of instruction." His lack of sincerity in this utterance is best attested by his entire neglect of the Academy, and continued failure to appoint to it any cadet out of the two hundred and six authorized by existing law. Folding his arms with official complacency, he stood with the gulf of war before him, preparing to sacrifice his country's honor to his own perversity; but, perhaps dreading the President's displeasure, and wishing to have something to fall back upon, he wrote confidentially, March 13, 1811, to Colonel Williams: "It is desirable that you should be with the Academy this summer to gather the remains of those who are attached to it, to preserve them with the acquirements they have attained, and to superintend their proficiency so far as the means furnished by the Government will permit."

Colonel Williams was then just completing Castle Williams, the most considerable fort in the United States, and with great energy had placed the state defenses of New York Harbor in good condition. In reply, therefore, the Colonel, doubtless not thinking it a great distinction for a Chief Engineer to gather from all parts of the United States less than a score of ignorant boys for instruction under two teachers, wrote, March 26, 1811, to the Secretary: "I conceive Captain Partridge more than competent to perform all the duties that can be requisite at West Point, for I presume that you will not increase the number of cadets at the Academy. . . . As you obligingly leave it to my option either to continue to superintend the works at New York in person, or take the command at West Point, I should certainly prefer the former, for all my zeal about the Military Academy is buried with the bill on that subject. But my idea is, that I ought to inspect the works to the northward, which I have not yet seen, and, from all I have heard relative to them, I think the summer will be very profitably spent in acquiring a perfect knowledge of their actual situation and the requisite defense for all the seaports. And, wherever I may be, I can give all necessary directions by letter."

The Academy, under command of Captain Partridge, nominally opened, April 1, 1811, with but nine cadets and one teacher besides himself.

To a proud, ambitious officer, the present condition of things was most humiliating, and, bound hand and foot by the orders of a petty tyrant who had some small spite to avenge, Colonel Williams felt there was no release but by resigning his commission. A warm friend, writing to him at this time, says: "I know all your difficulties and with what you have had to contend, but I think the prospect may brighten, and a few more months of anxiety perhaps will compensate for all, if the nation is not determined on giving up everything that is or has been military. . . . I would, if I were you, with such a corps looking up to you, and I may say to you alone, sacrifice a little more before quitting it."

A few days later, an officer of Engineers writes to him privately: "I am sorry to see you are in such bad spirits. If your exertions to promote the interests of the institution committed to your charge have been unavailing, you ought not on that account to despond, for you can always console yourself with the conviction of having done your duty, and your corps and country will ever bear testimony to your useful labours. If a man of your philosophy cannot bear up with the apathy of Government, and that total disregard of everything but popularity, who can? You are the last man in the world I should suspect of being touched with anything coming from such men as have had, for these ten years past, the control of affairs [in the War Department]. . . . We must with patience wait for a change for the better (for it cannot be worse), but always persevering in doing the best. If they neglect their duty, it is no reason we should be disheartened, however great the obstacles may be which such neglect may throw in the way of our zeal. . . . You hint a determination to resign, if certain circumstances more favorable to your views do not follow. . . . I hope it will be the last thing you will think of."

Captain Partridge, the senior Engineer officer at the Military Academy, also disgusted with holding only the semblance of a command, with his authority unsupported, and without the means of continuing instruction, asked leave of absence that he might more usefully employ his time in exploring and determining the heights of the Catskill, Green, and White Mountains. Knowing the folly of keeping up the farce of an Academy with a handful of cadets, and no one to instruct them without taking Engineer officers from the supervision of fortifications, Colonel Williams, in forwarding Captain Partridge's application, laid the whole naked facts before the Secretary of War. He who, against every remonstrance, had been scattering cadets from Eastport to New Orleans, suddenly changed his base, saying in reply, June 5, 1811: "To disperse the cadets by attaching them to companies at the present time, and under the present circumstances of the Academy, appears to be inexpedient. Let them remain and receive such instruction as is provided. Without examining the position taken by officers of the Corps of Engineers, it is to be regretted that, under existing circumstances, a disposition is discovered to avoid the performance of any duties (whether they are strictly required by law or not) which can possibly be applicable to the small number of cadets present at the Academy. Captain Partridge may be indulged with a furlough, provided his services are not, in your judgment, required at the Academy; but nothing in this indulgence is to be construed into an admission of the grounds taken by the officers."

The inefficient measures adopted by Congress in the past three years in relation to Great Britain had not answered the expectations of their projectors; but every appeal to her justice and magnanimity had proved fruitless, and, as heretofore, her inflexible hostility continued unchanged. The Administration, having learned wisdom from these feeble expedients, had determined to change its course, and, abandoning commercial restrictions, to try the effect of physical force. Accordingly, the President, in his annual Message of Nov. 5, 1811, says:—

“With this evidence of hostile inflexibility, in trampling on rights which no independent nation can relinquish, Congress will feel the duty of putting the United States into an armed attitude demanded by the crisis, and corresponding with the national spirit and expectations.

“I recommend, accordingly, that adequate provision be made for filling the ranks and prolonging the enlistments of the regular troops; for an auxiliary force, to be engaged for a more limited term; for the acceptance of volunteer corps, whose patriotic ardour may court a participation in urgent services; for detachments, as they may be wanted, of other portions of the militia ; and for such preparations of the great body as will proportion its usefulness to its intrinsic capacities. Nor can the occasion fail to remind you of the importance of those military seminaries, which, in any event, will form a valuable and frugal part of our military establishment."

The Secretary of War, with the same imbecile spirit and policy which had characterized all his acts since entering upon office, proposed to the chairman of the Senate Committee of Foreign Relations 1,000 regulars and 1,000 militia for manning all the defenses of our great commercial capital against the whole power of Britain's fleets, and hardly a respectable scarecrow of an army of 10,000 men to invade Canada and protect our extended coasts and frontiers.

The President's annual Message led to animated debates in Congress upon the relative advantages of volunteer militia and regular troops. The advocates of volunteers contended that the raising of the former was in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution, and the latter dangerous to civil liberty, as proved by the overthrow of other nations. The supporters of regulars answered that the term "volunteer" was not to be found in the Constitution, and the visions, scruples, apprehensions, and imaginary spectres of demagogues were not to be substituted for its provisions ; that "the power to raise and support armies" was limited only by the national exigencies, to be judged of by Congress ; that Washington, wise in council and action, and experienced as soldier and statesman, had never recommended volunteers, had emphatically condemned militia as the source of all our disasters, and never had expressed apprehensions of a standing army ; that, since his Presidency, volunteer militia had been advocated mainly on the ground that if they did no good they could do no harm ; that there was no danger to the nation from any species of force maintained by yearly appropriations, and composed of our own citizens, sons, and brothers ; that the Rubicon was now passed, and it was not the time to try doubtful expedients in sustaining our foreign relations with energy and firmness ; that war was an art not to be learned in a day, but a science whose principles must be long studied in schools or in the field ; that all who had participated in our struggles knew the necessity of disciplined troops, without which we could not meet European veterans landed on our shores ; that the democratic dogma of our chief reliance being upon militia was a fallacy, for, as Pickering said, it had “ never done any good to the country, except in the single affair of Bunker Hill ; ” that the cry for a patriot, not a mercenary army, was mere claptrap, instancing the Continental soldiers as paid troops, whose compensation did not lessen their patriotism nor diminish their gallantry ; that even the Newburg letters of an artful incendiary could not inflame the impoverished Revolutionary army to deeds of violence, or the sacrifice of our dear-bought liberties ; and that corruption, not military force, was the frequent cause of the downfall of nations.

Senator Smith, of Maryland, reported, Nov. 12, 1814, a bill making further provision for the Corps of Engineers and the re-organization of the Military Academy. Captain William M’Ree, of the Engineers, writing Jan. 16, 1812, to Colonel Williams, from Washington, says : “ Your apprehension, respecting the unfavorable disposition of the Secretary of War towards the success of this bill, was certainly correct. I could not ascertain his opinions on the probability of its final passage in the House, but his ideas relative to its necessity or expedience, as far as it concerns the Engineer department, appeared to me tolerably evident. ‘ If (to use his own words) the necessity of fortifications, etc., is the result of popular prejudice:’— Does it require any ingenuity to deduce the consequent estimation in which is held an institution, the great object of which establishment, it is asserted, derives importance merely from the operations of a ridiculous prejudice? Is it, then, difficult to divine what degree of support will be given to a bill which goes to the augmentation of, and making further provision for, a corps the utility of whose labors are thus rated? I am, notwithstanding, still of the opinion that the bill must go down in some shape or other; if not from any more flattering consideration, at least as a necessary appendage to the present system of war measures.”

Late in December, 1811, Colonel Williams returned from Frederick, Md., where he had been a member of the court martial for the trial of General Wilkinson, who was acquitted, much to the annoyance of Secretary Eustis. Major J. G. Swift, of the Engineers, had also been a member of the court, and in passing through Washington, Dec. 26, 1811, paid his respects to the Secretary of War. “I found myself,” says he, “not as graciously received as was the wont of that gentleman, who had favored me with his intimacy. I also found in this place of large gossip, especially so in the time of the session of Congress, that the acquittal of General Wilkinson was received with disappointment by the Executive, and it was rumoured that some charges had been made by an underling of the War Department adverse to the impartiality of some of the older officers of the court, but that Mr. Madison would not consent to any such mode of impugning the rights of opinion, and thus the charges were suppressed.”

With this new cause of displeasure, the Secretary’s hostility to Colonel Williams became so marked that he felt there was no alternative but in resigning his position of Chief Engineer. Little traces of his feelings are to be found in his official correspondence, but the private letters of his devoted wife tell the story. "Have you heard," says she, "anything unpleasant from the Secretary, that you talk of resigning immediately? Make up your mind, and rest assured that I shall be perfectly happy in spending the rest of my life at Mount Pleasant, if you can be content to relinquish the bustle of the world." Again she writes: "If you are sure that you have not suffered personal resentment to influence you in the least, or to carry you one jot beyond the true line of moderation and propriety, I think you perfectly right to pursue your way regardless of consequences, and to support, whilst you belong to it, the interest and honour of the Army and of the corps to which you belong; only prepare yourself so as not to be fretted by anything they can do. Having already almost made up your mind to resign, it is as well to do all the good you can to those you leave behind you." Later she says: "I am quite grieved to see by every letter that you are in purgatory. . . . I think it unfortunate that you did not make up your mind to resign sooner. Now I presume that you must wait until the question of peace or war is decided. . . . We have sufficient, with prudence, to live upon; banish, therefore, all concern of that kind from your mind, and make a determination to give up your commission whenever the situation of the country will admit it."

The officers of his corps, who to the highest official respect joined the most affectionate regard, entreated him not to resign. One speaks of the "almost paternal care of its beloved chief," and another writes: "I am sorry to hear you talking of private life. . . . I believe your remaining at the head of the corps at this time is more essential to its respectability and its happiness than it has been ever before. For now we have a Father who has the affection of his sons, and without his protection, and unceasing labours for their honour and welfare, they stand at present but a poor chance of arriving at that elevation on which you would wish to leave them."

Captain Partridge, who had been absent from West Point on leave since June 5, 1811, wished to continue the determination of mountain heights, particularly the Alleghanies, as he understood, March 17, 1812, there was no necessity of his return to the Academy, where there was nothing to be done, "all the cadets having been commissioned except Smith," who was employed as a clerk in the War Department. This supposition was nearly correct, as, except two commissioned in March and two in June, every remaining cadet had been promoted to the Army, Jan. 3, 1812, essentially without other instruction than that received before midsummer of 1810, when the Academy, as an educational institution, may be said to have ceased to exist.

Congress, by the act of Jan. 11, 1812, to raise an additional military force for five years, authorized 104 cadets, making, with the 206 provided for by the laws of 1802 and 1808, 310 cadets; yet, with this expressed desire of the nation, and but five months before the actual declaration of war against one of the greatest powers of the earth, Secretary Eustis failed to make a single cadet appointment. To his everlasting disgrace be it said, that hostilities began without a pupil in our only educational establishment for the training of officers for the vast military force required for the defense of our thousands of miles of coast and frontier, and the invasion of the enemy's territory.

Francis D. Masson, whose position as Teacher of French had been filled since April 15, 1810, by his brother Florimond, resigned March 31, 1812, leaving the Military Academy without a single instructor.

The bill making further provision for the Corps of Engineers, which had long been under discussion, finally, April 29, 1812, became law. The provisions relating to the re-organization of the Military Academy are as follows:—

“SEC. 2. That the Military Academy shall consist of the Corps of Engineers, and the following professors, in addition to the teachers of the French language and drawing, already provided, namely: one Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, with the pay and emoluments of lieutenant-colonel, if not an officer of the corps, and, if taken from the corps, then so much in addition to his pay and emoluments as shall equal those of a lieutenant-colonel; one Professor of Mathematics, with the pay and emoluments of a major, if not an officer of the corps, and, if taken from the corps, then so much in addition to his pay and emoluments as shall equal those of a major; one Professor of the Art of Engineering in all its branches, with the pay and emoluments of a major, if not an officer of the corps, and, if taken from the corps, then so much in addition to his pay and emoluments as shall equal those of a major; each of the foregoing professors to have an assistant professor, which assistant professors shall be taken from the most prominent characters of the officers or cadets, and receive the pay and emoluments of captains, and no other pay or emoluments, while performing their duties: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall entitle the academical staff, as such, to any command in the Army separate from the Academy.

“SEC. 3. That the cadets heretofore appointed in the service of the United States, whether of artillery, cavalry, riflemen, or infantry, or that may in future be appointed as hereinafter provided, shall at no time exceed two hundred and fifty; that they may be attached, at the discretion of the President of the United States, as students, to the Military Academy, and be subject to the established regulations thereof; that they shall be arranged into companies of non-commissioned officers and privates, according to the directions of the Commandant of Engineers, and be officered from the said corps, for the purpose of military instruction; that there shall be added to each company of cadets four musicians; and the said corps shall be trained and taught all the duties of a private, non-commissioned officer, and officer, be encamped at least three months of each year, and taught all the duties incident to a regular camp; that the candidates for cadets be not under the age of fourteen nor above the age of twenty-one years; that each cadet, previously to his appointment by the President of the United States, shall be versed in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and that he shall sign articles, with the consent of his parent or guardian, by which he shall engage to serve five years, unless sooner discharged; and all such cadets shall be entitled to and receive the pay and emoluments allowed by law to cadets in the Corps of Engineers.

“SEC. 4. That when any cadet shall receive a regular degree from the academical staff, after going through all the classes, he shall be considered as among the candidates for a commission in any corps, according to the duties he may be judged competent to perform; and in case there shall not, at the time, be a vacancy in such corps, he may be attached to it, at the discretion of the President of the United States, by brevet of the lowest grade, as a supernumerary officer, with the usual pay and emoluments of such grade, until a vacancy shall happen: Provided, That there shall not be more than one supernumerary officer to any one company at the same time.

“SEC. 5. That $25,000 be appropriated for erecting buildings, and for providing an apparatus, a library, and all necessary implements, and for such contingent expenses as may be necessary and proper, in the judgment of the President of the United States, for such an institution."

This law visibly left the Military Academy at West Point; but, on its passage and long after, it was a dead letter, for the institution was without an instructor or cadet.

Christian E. Zoeller, who had resigned April 30, 1810, was reappointed July 1, 1812, Teacher of Drawing. Of course he did not then enter upon duty, as there were no cadets to be taught.

Colonel Williams, on the 10th of July, 1812, tendered his resignation as Chief Engineer of the United States Army and ex-officio Superintendent of the Military Academy, which was accepted August 29, to date July 31, 1812. The history of this transaction, involving military principles, will be given somewhat at length.

Colonel Williams, it will be recollected, had once before resigned, June 20, 1803, on a question of his rights of command. After twenty months, March 1, 1805, Lieutenant Macomb wrote to him: "I rejoice to let you know that it has been hinted by the President that your return to the service would be very pleasing to him;" and, on the 29th, General Wilkinson, writing from Washington, says: "The partiality which the President cherishes for you, and the service of your country, will not only justify but demand some concessions of opinion on doctrines which depend much on feeling," and he continues, "your right of command is held in trust by the President, and will be conferred when it may be deemed convenient to the public service; in the mean time you are subject to his orders only."

A general order, first approved by the Secretary of War, then issued, recognizing the principles above stated, and in two or three days afterwards, April 19, 1805, Colonel Williams accepted his commission of Chief Engineer which he had resigned June 20, 1803.

The act establishing the Rules and Regulations for the Government of the Army passed April 10, 1806, and by the 63d of these Articles of War the power of the President to grant the command, by special engagement held in trust by him, is formally recognized and made law.

Till May 27, 1812, Colonel Williams continued to receive his orders from the War Department only; but on that day the Secretary of War, through the Acting Adjutant-General, thought proper to turn him over to Brig.-General Bloomfield, to whom the command of the city and harbor of New York had been confided.

On the 21st of June, 1812, by the return of that post which brought to New York the declaration of war against Great Britain, Colonel Williams claimed the command "held in trust by the President of the United States," and legally designated by the 63d Article of War. He says in a respectful letter: "By the 27th section of the Act of March 16, 1802, it is decided that 'the Engineers shall be subject at all times to do duty in such places and on such services as the President of the United States shall direct,' and by the 63d Article of War 'the Engineers are not to assume, nor are they subject to be ordered on, any duty beyond the line of their immediate profession, except by the special order of the President of the United States.'"

"While the peace establishment alone existed, I had but three superior officers,—General Wilkinson and Colonels Burbeck and Cushing. I have now fourteen superiors, and, while I cannot assume the command of a subaltern, I am exposed to perform professional duty where a subaltern commands.

"War being now declared, my situation in this harbour becomes humiliating in the last degree. The works that have been constructed by me become inhabited and commanded by my inferiors, for in military command I have not the authority of a sergeant.

“I pray you, sir, to relieve me from this unpleasant situation, and by a special order, which you alone can give, to place me in that which my nominal rank naturally points out, and which my honour requires. I indulge a hope that this reasonable request will be complied with immediately, and that by return of post I shall be placed in a command consistent with my character, and such as, I hope also, is not unmerited by the public services I have rendered.”

On the 23d of June, the President directed the required command to be given, which the Secretary of War communicated to General Bloomfield in the following terms: “It is the pleasure of the President that, whenever the exigencies of the service may require the talents and knowledge of the officers of the Corps of Engineers beyond the line of their immediate profession, you may assign to those under your command such duties in the line of the Army as may comport with their rank.” On the 27th, General Bloomfield assured Colonel Williams that arrangements should be made to accord with his wishes.

The order was verbally communicated to Colonel Williams, Castle Williams designated as his post, and he gave on the 2d of July his estimate of the force and organization of its garrison. On the 7th, he put the Engineers under the direction of Major Armistead, reported himself ready for duty, and was about to take quarters on Governor’s Island to exercise the command due to his rank, and in conformity to the President’s order, communicated on the 23d of June by the Secretary of War.

A memorial, signed by eighteen company officers, principally subaltern, was directed to Colonel Burbeck, in command of the Artillery in the harbor of New York, and left on the table of General Bloomfield's quarters. This memorial indulged in much ad captandum declamation, expressed great personal respect for the Engineers, and acknowledged the "latitude given to the President by the act of March 16, 1802, justifying him in assuming the power to call them to command troops," but affirmed that the Corps of Engineers are "by law, universal custom, and the importance of their professional duties, separated from the line of the Army," forgetting that the law makes no such declaration, and that there can be no "universal custom" in a country where there never was a Corps of Engineers till the existing enactment of 1802, the foreign engineers in the Revolutionary Army, and, subsequently, having been specifically employed as separate individuals, having no corps organization whatever.

On the rumor of this opposition, General Bloomfield had, on the 6th of July, written to the Secretary of War for fresh instructions, and on the 11th the Secretary answered, "leaving the employment of the Engineers altogether subject to his judgment and decision." While awaiting the Secretary's reply, General Bloomfield had, on the 10th, communicated to Colonel Williams a copy of his suspended order, which was to have been promulgated on the 9th. It is as follows:—

"It being 'the pleasure of the President' that 'whenever the exigencies of the service may require the talents and knowledge of the officers of the Corps of Engineers beyond the line of their immediate profession,' that these under command at this post 'be assigned such duties in the line of the Army as may comport with their rank;' and the General commanding believing that 'the exigencies of the service require' on this occasion the talents and abilities of Jonathan Williams, Esq., the Colonel of the Corps of Engineers, therefore, in pursuance of the orders of the President, directs that Colonel Williams take upon himself such duties in the line of the Army, stationed in this harbour and city, as may comport with the rank of Colonel in the Army and service of the United States, according to seniority of commission; and he is to be respected and obeyed accordingly.

[Signed] JOSEPH BLOOMFIELD."

A copy of the remonstrance of the eighteen company officers was also communicated to Colonel Williams, to explain the suspension of the above order. In forwarding this remonstrance, on the 9th, to the Secretary of War, General Bloomfield says: "I have deemed it correct to exercise that discretion with which the pleasure of the President has honoured me, to suspend calling Colonel Williams or any of the Corps of Engineers to exercise the duties in the line of the Army contemplated by your communication of the 23d of June last, until I shall be favoured with the further orders of the President in this unpleasant business."

Upon receiving, on July 10, the above communication from General Bloomfield, Colonel Williams wrote to the President of the United States as follows: —

"Since my letter to you of the 21st June, General Bloomfield communicated to me an order from the Secretary of War, which in substance agreed with the request I had the honour to make to you, and of which you have a copy enclosed. After completing some official duties at Philadelphia, I returned to New York, and reported myself ready to take such command as might 'comport with my rank.'

"General Bloomfield was about to issue the requisite order, when he received a communication, of which I also enclose a copy, being a remonstrance against the measure, signed by eighteen company officers. Far be it from me, sir, to create any division among men whose profession, of all others, should form a well-connected and affectionate brotherhood. But I must be permitted to judge for myself in what relates personally to me; therefore it only remains to do the last act that can be done consistently with my honour, and a desire to preserve harmony among the officers in the Army, and I hereby resign my commission.

“The case is too imperious to need much argument, but it may not be improper to observe that, after having resigned on a former occasion, I was called again into service upon an express stipulation which was afterwards made law by the 63d Article of the Rules and Regulations for the Government of the Army. This being the condition upon which alone I accepted my commission, I hold myself absolved from all obligation the moment it ceases to operate. The loss of an officer in his sixty-third year may not be considered of great importance when compared with that of eighteen officers in the vigor of youth, for by the tone of the remonstrance it is to be presumed that this consequence would follow if the order were to be enforced.”

At the same time, Colonel Williams wrote to Secretary Eustis: “For reasons offered to the President of the United States I have resigned, and do hereby resign, my commission as Colonel in the Corps of Engineers.”

Colonel Williams announced his resignation to his command in a feeling and manly order, concluding thus:

“In making this communication to the Corps of Engineers, the Colonel Commandant is equally influenced, by motives of self-justification, to those for whom he has, from the first moment of his connection with them, felt the affection of a parent; and of leaving behind him a monument of his sense of what is due to the honour of that corps which is, by the records of the Army, placed at the head of the list. That it may never suffer the humiliation of being deprived of those rights which the other corps indiscriminately enjoy, shall ever be his constant prayer. Farewell, my dear friends! farewell!"

General T. H. Cushing, Adjutant-General of the Army, in transmitting, Aug. 29, 1812, the acceptance of Colonel Williams's resignation, "to take effect on the 31st of July, 1812," adds the following private letter:—

"In communicating an order which dissolves our connection as brothers-in-arms, permit me to offer my warmest wishes for your prosperity, happiness, and honour, and to express the regret I feel, in common with many respectable military and civil friends, at the public loss sustained by the resignation of an officer so distinguished for intelligence, industry, and zeal in the public service."

Thus was lost to the Army one of its brightest ornaments; to the Corps of Engineers, a chief whose devotion to its welfare and honor was unbounded; and to the Military Academy, a father who for years tenderly watched over its infancy, and long struggled for its advancement and eminence against the continued apathy of Congress, the feeble support of Secretary Dearborn, and the bitter hostility of his narrow-minded successor.

It will be naturally asked, why the administration of President Madison had not essayed some adjustment of difficulties in the seven weeks it had held Colonel Williams's resignation under consideration? Why, if it valued his great services and eminent abilities, it had not declined to allow him to leave the head of his distinguished corps? or why, to cut the Gordian knot of his just rights, it had not generously given one of its noblest veterans, fourth in rank in the whole Army, a higher grade, instead of conferring such superior appointments upon inferior men, unknown to fame? It was because William Eustis was Secretary of War, and could not, or would not, rise "to the height of this great argument" in a manner befitting a Cabinet minister of the infant republic entering upon a death struggle with a giant of the earth. His hostility, somewhat political, — Williams being a Federalist of the Washington school, — was more splenetical, he having, from his entrance upon office, vowed war against the Military Academy and the Corps of Engineers. Bourbon-like, he knew nothing of military matters beyond what he had learned in the Revolution, where our Engineers were soldiers of fortune, serving for pay and titles, with no more rank and command than so many wagon-masters. In the prejudiced mind of an ignorant Secretary, those Revolutionary ideas were paramount to all our subsequent experience, and it was not for his narrow comprehension to appreciate the noble disinterestedness of one who had created a Corps of Engineers from native talent, who had organized a Military Academy for the education of our own officers, who had completely metamorphosed our coast defenses, and who, as President Jefferson had said, combined the virtues with the love of science of his illustrious kinsman, Dr. Benjamin Franklin.

After his resignation, Colonel Williams retired to his beautiful country seat on the banks of the Schuylkill, to enjoy that repose which had been denied him for long years. In imitation of Metastasio, he could now say: —

"Thanks, dear [Eustis], indulgent cheat,
 Kind Heaven, and your more kind deceit,
 At length have set me free :
 I feel no rival's proud control,
 I feel no inmate in my soul
 But peace and liberty."

At Mount Pleasant he received constant tokens of the attachment of his brother officers, and of civilians who had been associated with him. In a private letter De Witt Clinton says: "If we consider your absence from the Commission for the Defense of New York Harbour as so great a privation to us as an individual, be assured that your resignation as an officer is a subject of general regret: considering our exposed situation and the confidence reposed in you by all our citizens, we esteem your departure as a loss that cannot be supplied."

General Morton, of New York, writes: "I cannot suppress a feeling of indignation when I reflect that, from the weakness and wickedness of men in office, we have lost the virtues and talents which would have benefitted and honoured our country."

Major Swift echoes the unanimous sentiments of his brother Engineers when he says to Colonel Williams: "The corps are never to be without your aid as long as you remain on this world's stage, and you can never be without their grateful regard." As they could no longer enjoy his presence at West Point, the Corps of Engineers requested him to sit for his full-length likeness, which was executed by Sully, and now adorns the library of the Military Academy. A copy of the same was ordered Nov. 1, 1813, by the city of New York, "in consideration of the high sense the Common Council entertain of the important services rendered to the city by Colonel Jonathan Williams in preparing and executing plans of defence for the port, and as an evidence of the distinguished esteem they entertain for his character and professional talents."

Governor Tompkins, of New York, highly estimating Colonel Williams's talents and services to the State, conferred upon him, May 17, 1814, the brevet of Brigadier-General of the State Militia; and Feb. 13, 1815, he was commissioned a full Brigadier-General by a vote of the Legislature of New York.

These were no common testimonials to the talents and character of a citizen of another State, stationed among them only for a few years.

After the retirement of Secretary Eustis from the office he had so unworthily filled, his successor, General Armstrong, a soldier who properly estimated true merit and eminent service, made, with the President's sanction, through John Bullus, Navy Agent at New York, a proposition for Colonel Williams's return to the head of the Corps of Engineers, with the rank of Major-General; which, for some unknown reason, was not carried into effect, though Williams had intimated, April 29, 1813, "that such an offer could not be declined consistently with the sentiments he had avowed relative to the service," particularly as the Government, by its late acts, had "acquiesced in the principles for which he had contended."

Hardly had Colonel Williams returned to private life before he was called from his retirement to become the executive member of the Committee of Defense of the Delaware River and Bay for the security of Philadelphia. At the same time, he was frequently consulted respecting the fortifications of New York Harbor, and many matters relating to the Military Academy, and was the Presiding Director of the Lancaster and Schuylkill Bridge Company.

In the autumn of 1814, General Williams's fellow-citizens of Philadelphia, relying upon his superior abilities and varied experience, elected him to Congress; but he was not destined to add a statesman's reputation to that of a useful citizen, a firm patriot, and an accomplished soldier, death having, May 16, 1815, removed him, at the age of sixty-five, to a higher reward than he had received on earth.

SUMMARY.

As sparks light vast conflagrations, so destiny seems to delight in bringing about great results from insignificant and doubtful beginnings. In sketching, therefore, the first ten years of the history of the United States Military Academy, we have dwelt somewhat minutely upon its early struggles, delineated the characters of its original instructors, and exhibited the good and bad phases of its civil and military administration.

It is now proper that we should give a condensed summary of the leading points developed in these ten years of trial.

ORGANIZATION. — By the law of May 9, 1794, the grade of cadet in the Army was first established, two being allowed to each company of the Corps of Artillerists and Engineers. By subsequent acts, an increased number was authorized, though none were appointed till May 12, 1800, and but nine up to the passage of the law of March 16, 1802, fixing the military peace establishment, by which the Corps of Engineers became a separate branch of service, and was made “to constitute a Military Academy.” This institution was, therefore, originally designed as a school for the instruction of Engineers, was the headquarters of that corps, and the chief ex-officio its Superintendent; but, as forty cadets of Artillery as well as ten of Engineers were attached to it, the interpretation of the law did not circumscribe the functions of the Academy, which, in fact, under Engineer administration, became an educational establishment for all the cadets of the Army.

The law of April 12, 1808, authorized 156 additional cadets of artillery, dragoons, infantry, and riflemen; and that of Jan. 11, 1812, provided for 64 more of artillery and cavalry, making a total of 310, which was reduced to 260 by the act of April 29, 1812, reorganizing the Academy.

The whole number of cadets attached to the institution up to the latter date had been only 117, all of whom except two were appointed prior to President Madison's administration. The greatest number in the Academy at any one time from 1802 to 1812 was thirty-six, and the average for that entire period did not exceed twenty.

The instructors were all officers of Engineers, except one Teacher of French, 1803-12; one of Mathematics, 1807-9; and one of Drawing, 1808-10.

The library was very small, the apparatus quite incomplete, the buildings much dilapidated, the messing extremely poor, and the facilities provided by the Government totally inadequate to the creation of a scientific school for the proper education of officers of the Army.

CIVIL ADMINISTRATION. — Presidents Jefferson and Madison, both enlightened statesmen, were warm patrons of the Military Academy, and, appreciating the importance of scientific instruction, in their annual messages frequently urged upon Congress liberal provisions for building up a great national seminary for educating officers to direct our arms; but absorbed in other weighty matters, the details for carrying out their wise policy were intrusted to their less sagacious Cabinet ministers.

General Dearborn, self-educated by his long and honorable service in the field, and not impressed by the scientific attainments of many foreign charlatans who served with more pay than brains in the Revolution, never, as Secretary of War, took a zealous interest in the Military Academy; and his successor, Dr. Eustis, was a positive foe to the institution, which, from his first entrance to the War Department, he determined to crush. By his failure to appoint cadets, and his dispersion of the few in service before they were half educated, the Academy, except in name, ceased to exist before he had been a year in office, when war with Great Britain was as inevitable as the day it was declared. Not a cadet nor instructor was to be found at West Point when the struggle began.

If from 1808 to 1812, during which the portents of hostilities deeply darkened our political horizon, the Academy had been kept full with the 206 cadets allowed by law, and the course of instruction limited to two years, how different might have been the results of our first and second campaigns! Instead of 60 or 70 graduates to take the field, we should have had 400 to 500 to distribute as adjutants, field officers, etc., among the new regiments. It was within the competence of Secretary Eustis to do this, but he preferred not to perform his sacred duty, and rather by its neglect to play the Judas, and be our betrayer to the enemy.

MILITARY SUPERVISION.—The law of March 16, 1802, creating the Military Academy, provided that “the principal Engineer, or in his absence the next in rank, shall, under the direction of the President of the United States, be its Superintendent.” Colonel Williams, being the head of the Corps of Engineers, and never having been absent from West Point under circumstances which rendered it impracticable for him to direct and govern the institution, was by law, as he was in fact, the sole Superintendent, except from June 20, 1803, to April 19, 1805, when Capt. W. A. Barron, as senior Engineer officer present, exercised the supervision. Colonel Williams organized the institution with the sanction of the Secretary of War, made regulations for its government, and, whether present or absent, directed the studies and instruction in their minutest details; and his rules and orders were not subject to be annulled, changed, or modified by any junior officer having the immediate charge of the Academy in his absence. He alone took cognizance of the graver offenses and awarded punishments, and, during his absence, the officer in temporary command could only in urgent cases order arrests and reprimands. Colonel Williams was admirably qualified for the exercise of the high and varied duties of Superintendent by a large experience, high-toned character, soldierly qualities, and untiring industry.

During the twenty-two months while Colonel Williams was out of service, Captain Barron, as commanding officer, caused instruction to retrograde and discipline to decline at the Military Academy.

The Superintendent had no military staff, except the medical officer of the post and occasionally a subaltern of Engineers detailed as temporary adjutant.

There was no organized academic staff, each teacher being confined to his own branch of instruction, the Superintendent directing the whole.

REGULATIONS. — The first Regulations, made immediately after the opening of the Academy in 1802, were very brief, and adapted to the small requirements of the institution. After an experience of eight years, a more extended code was approved, April 30, 1810, and this is the basis upon which the school rests to this day. These Regulations established fifteen to twenty years as the age for entrance; obliged cadets to serve the United States for four years, unless sooner discharged; made a knowledge of the rudiments of an English education necessary for admission; fixed the entire course of studies; required a certificate of proficiency in the whole curriculum to be necessary before receiving a commission; abolished furloughs, except during vacations, or under peculiar circumstances; prescribed the same uniform for all cadets of the different arms of service ; and ordained many minor rules for interior police and discipline. Though these Regulations showed the wisdom and foresight of the Superintendent, they were never operative under his administration, the Academy having, shortly after their approval, ceased to exist through the dereliction of the Secretary of War.

ADMISSION OF CADETS. — They entered the Academy without mental or physical examination, on any day or in any month of the year. Of the small body of cadets at the Academy from 1802 to 1810, some had good preliminary education before going to West Point ; a few were college graduates ; one had been an officer in the British Army ; another had practiced law in the Supreme Court of New York ; and generally they had more knowledge and maturity of mind than those of the present day ; but they were of all ages, from twelve to thirty-four years, one or two being married men with several children.

QUARTERS. — The cadets were lodged with soldiers in the old “ Long Barracks ” of the Revolution (near the site of the present hotel) ; except for a short period in 1805, were boarded at different private houses ; and were instructed in a two-story wooden building which served both as an “ Academy ” and for headquarters.

DISCIPLINE. — Colonel Williams, when in person superintending the Military Academy, maintained excellent discipline, with the courtesy of a gentleman and the kindness of a father. During his absence from West Point in 1803–5, while out of service, and in 1806–9, when engaged much of his time on the defenses of New York Harbor, great irregularities took place, from want of proper military control on the part of the commanding officer, but more because the instructors were all civilians and foreigners. After 1809, when Dr. Eustis became Secretary of War, the Military Academy became thoroughly disorganized, and discipline was so completely palsied that Colonel Williams had to resort to the most summary measures to keep up even its semblance.

Till 1808, while cadets were considered officers of the lowest grade in the Army, they were tried by courts martial convened by order of the Superintendent, who executed sentences extending to expulsion from the Academy; but to drop them finally from the rolls required the sanction of the Secretary of War. After 1808, courts martial for the trial of cadets were abolished, and the Superintendent awarded all punishments upon his own investigation, or that of a court of inquiry detailed by him to ascertain facts in cases involving suspension, rustication, or dismissal.

INSTRUCTION. — Term time, somewhat varied, usually began in April and ended in November. Study hours, including recitations, after 1805, were from 8 A. M. to 1 P. M., 2 to 4 P. M., and in the evening; and drills and practical exercises from 4 P. M. to sunset and occasionally before breakfast. The instructors, at any one time, never exceeded four, and sometimes were reduced to one. The course of instruction was limited to the elements of geometrical and algebraic mathematics, with the use of surveying instruments; a smattering of the French language; the rudiments of military and topographical drawing; lectures and practical exercises in the elements of fortification; infantry drill, extending to the school of the company; the first principles of artillery, with the drill of field-pieces, target practice, and a little laboratory duty; and, for a very few of the most intelligent cadets, the higher mathematics, mechanics, and practical astronomy.

Mathematics ordinarily comprised algebra, to include cubic equations, geometry, plane trigonometry, mensuration of planes and solids, and the use of instruments in surveying areas, heights, and distances. All cadets were required to obtain a thorough knowledge of this course (contained in Hutton's first volume), and some, who desired it, were taught the application of algebra to geometry, conic sections, spherical trigonometry, etc. This course consumed about two years, but somewhat varied with the age, previous attainments, industry, and capacity of the pupil.

French was ordinarily limited to the study of Masson's French Grammar and his Reader; but a few, who took private lessons, acquired a tolerable facility in speaking the language.

Drawing extended to the use of instruments, a little topography, and right-lined drawing, as applied chiefly to fortifications.

Engineering was taught first by the Superintendent, and subsequently, till 1810, by Francis D. Masson, through lectures on the elements of fortification, illustrated by a model of a fort, and by field exercises in practical military engineering. This course was little attended to except by cadets of Engineers.

Infantry comprised the drill of the school of the soldier and of the company, with dress-parades and inspections.

Artillery was little studied. Only definitions from Scheel's Artillery were learned, practical pyrotechny and preparation of fixed ammunition taught, and the use of field-pieces and mortars in drills and at target practice.

Natural Philosophy did not constitute any part of the course of instruction; but a few of the most advanced pupils studied Enfield's Philosophy, and practical astronomy.

CLASSIFICATION. — Owing to the irregularity of admission and promotion of cadets, and the variations from six months to six years in their term of probation, there were not, nor could there be, annual classes. Cadets attended their teachers singly, or in small squads of three or four, according to their previous preparation and capacity, without regard to date of admission, each being allowed to advance according to his industry and ability. Cadetships were not ordinarily solicited by parents for their sons, but appointments to the Academy were secured by young men of mature age who were impelled by an invincible inclination for the profession of arms. Hence they came to West Point with a fixed determination to pursue their studies with diligence, and thus gain their object in the shortest time possible, which averaged less than two and a half years. As a general rule, the cadets from 1802 to 1810 came to the Military Academy better educated, made greater progress while there, and left it with higher attainments, at least in mathematics, than those who were graduated between 1810 and 1820 or 1821.

GRADUATION. — There being no classification of cadets nor fixed term of probation, they passed from one study to another at the discretion of the Superintendent, and were graduated whenever he deemed them competent to receive promotion to the Army. Examinations, till Dr. Eustis became Secretary of War, took place annually in October or November, when cadets who had completed their course of instruction, and were found qualified, received a certificate of proficiency, and were recommended for promotion to the arm of service for which they were best suited, the Engineers ranking first. If vacancies existed in the Army, graduates were immediately promoted to fill them; otherwise they had to wait till vacancies occurred. While thus waiting, the graduate continued to receive instruction at the Academy or was furloughed, at his own option. Occasionally and oftener after 1809, when vacancies were numerous or strong political influences were brought to bear, there was danger of promotions being made prematurely from candidates not properly qualified.

Though only eighty-nine had been graduated from the Military Academy prior to the commencement of hostilities against Great Britain, and of these but sixty-five were then in the Army, they nobly performed their part in this "Second War of Independence." Of those serving in the field, one sixth laid down their lives in the struggle, one fourth were killed or wounded, and one fifth of those who survived received one or two brevets each for their distinguished gallantry in battle. Four — Swift, Armistead, Totten, and Gratiot — subsequently rose to be Chiefs of Engineers of the Army; one — Bomford — to be Chief of Ordnance; three — Swift, Thayer, and De Russy — to be Superintendents of the Military Academy; and many held high posts of honor and trust in civil life.

CONCLUSION. — From the foregoing it will appear that, during the first ten years of the existence of the Military Academy, its students were few, its teachers inadequate to the requirements of military education, its discipline and instruction as good as the appliances admitted, and that it produced all the results which could be legitimately claimed from a feebly endowed institution left to its own resources, and virtually suffered in 1810 to perish as an abandoned foundling amid the Hudson Highlands, by the fault of the Secretary of War, who should have been its parent head. Practically the Superintendent was its sole foster-father; and to its welfare, character, and development he gave an untiring devotion, though burdened with other weighty cares, being at the same time in command of the Corps of Engineers and in immediate charge of the construction of important fortifications in New York Harbor.

"In the birth of societies," says Montesquieu, "it is the chiefs of the republics who form the civil institution, and in the sequel it is the chief institution which forms the chiefs of the republics." This aphorism has proved true of the Military Academy, created by the chiefs of our republic, and which in turn has formed the military chiefs of the republic.

It is a remarkable coincidence that the projector of the Military Academy was the revered Father of his Country, its founder the famed author of the Declaration of Independence, and its first Superintendent the noble son of a patriot sire who presided over the memorable meeting which threw down the gauntlet of defiance to British oppression; that the institution should have been located on the sacred spot around which Revolutionary history so thickly clusters; and that as an educational establishment it was first opened for instruction on the anniversary of the nation's birth, — July 4, 1802! Garlanded with such thrilling associations, and as a jewel set in Nature's majesty, is it to be wondered at that every true and loving graduate of the Military Academy gravitates to West Point as to the Mecca of his heart!

CHAPTER II.

PERIOD FROM JULY 31, 1812, TO JULY 28, 1817.

BREVET BRIG.-GENERAL JOSEPH G. SWIFT, SUPER-INTENDENT.¹

UPON the resignation of Colonel Williams, July 31, 1812, Colonel Joseph G. Swift assumed command of the Corps of Engineers, though it was not till Dec. 4, 1812, that he was confirmed by the Senate as Chief Engineer of the United States Army, and ex-officio Superintendent of the Military Academy.

War with Great Britain having been declared, the Chief Engineer's duties in the field and as the head of an important department did not permit of his taking the personal command of the Military Academy, though he made frequent visits to West Point. To bar the authority claimed by Captain Partridge, the local commander, General Swift, by permission of the President, assumed, Jan. 5, 1815, the Inspectorship of the Academy.

There was no necessity for the Chief Engineer to be at West Point, the Military Academy having virtually ceased to exist through the perversity of Secretary Eustis, who appointed no cadets, and had dispersed in 1811 all others who had not been graduated. The great institution, authorized by the law of April 29, 1812, to consist of two hundred and sixty cadets and a respectable academic staff, was, upon the accession of the new Superintendent, reduced to one Captain of Engineers, a

Teacher of Drawing, and a temporary Teacher of French. Both of these teachers being on furlough, Captain Partridge constituted the entire Academy present for duty!

Fortunately, the author of all this disgraceful condition of affairs, Secretary Eustis, was a few months subsequently (Dec. 3, 1812) invited to resign his office by a committee of his own political party. He was succeeded, Jan. 13, 1813, by an able veteran of the Revolution, General John Armstrong, who, unfortunately, like his two predecessors, had the same prejudices against military education.

ALDEN PARTRIDGE, the locum tenens at West Point, was born, Jan. 12, 1785, at Norwich, Vt. His father, who had done service in the Revolution, gave his son a good education, fitting him for college, which he entered at Dartmouth, N. H., in August, 1802, the year before Sylvanus Thayer became a pupil in that institution. Here young Partridge made good progress in his course of studies, before completing which he was appointed to be a cadet in the United States Military Academy, which he entered Dec. 14, 1805, and was graduated therefrom, Oct. 30, 1806, and promoted to a First Lieutenancy in the Corps of Engineers. From that time till his forced resignation from the Army, April 15, 1818, he was almost continuously on duty at the Military Academy, where he proved a good mathematical instructor and an admirable drill-master, but showed little administrative ability to govern a great institution of learning. With his industry, interest in military affairs, and rigid discipline, he doubtless would have made a respectable frontier post commander.

On the last day of September, 1812, Captain Partridge was fortunate in having command of one new cadet, Charles S. Merchant, who dropped in at West Point to become a subject for the development of the Captain's drilling talent in teaching the new "plebe" the goose-step, and how to keep his shoulders back by gluing his little fingers to the seams of his pantaloons. By winter, five other aspirants for military glory reported for duty, but, the weather being cold and fuel scarce, the six embryo heroes were furloughed till April 15, 1813, when the Military Academy, with scarce a dozen cadets, resumed its existence.

Two days before this resurrection, Captain Partridge had become Professor of Mathematics, and Oct. 7, 1812, Lieut.-Colonel Jared Mansfield had been re-appointed as Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, but did not enter upon duty till April 10, 1814. Teachers Zoeller and Masson, having returned from furlough, completed the existing academic staff. During the year, the number of cadets was considerably increased, and at the end of the academic term the class of 1813 was graduated, consisting of one member, George Trescot, who, being the head man, was promoted to the Corps of Engineers, in which he did good service during the existing war.

During the year 1814, there were appointed one hundred and fifty-five cadets, and from March 11 to July 21, there were thirty-one promoted to be Lieutenants in the Army. Captain Partridge had been transferred to the Department of Engineering, his place being supplied by the appointment, Sep. 1, 1813, of Andrew Ellicott, who entered upon duty as Professor of Mathematics at the end of the winter furlough of 1813-14.

ANDREW ELLICOTT, descended from a very enterprising and inventive family, was born, Jan. 24, 1754, in Bucks County, Penn. Public attention was early drawn to him because of his attainments in science, and hence he was commissioned by Congress to assist in the division and settlement of the boundaries of the new States. In 1784, he was employed by Virginia to establish the division line between it and Pennsylvania; the year after, he was one of the Commissioners to locate the western boundary of Pennsylvania; and, in 1786, he determined the northern limit of that State. These and other boundary surveys won for him the appellation of "Geographer of the United States."

Major Ellicott, in 1790, was employed by the Government to lay out the city of Washington, and determine the boundaries of the District of Columbia. After completing these and other important works, Ellicott was appointed by President Washington, in 1796, one of the Commissioners to fix the boundary line between the United States and the Spanish Possessions, which being satisfactorily completed, Governor M'Kean, of Pennsylvania, appointed him, in 1800, the Secretary of the Land Office of the State.

Ellicott retired to private life in 1808, was the recipient of many honors, including a membership of the National Institute of France, and enjoyed the intimacy of many of the most distinguished men of his day.

After so many years of faithful service, it is distressing to read in his letters that his pay was withheld by the Government, and he, in consequence, was reduced to such poverty that he was compelled to sell his library, and even his instruments. Notwithstanding this treatment by the Government, which had so largely profited by his services, Ellicott's love of country remained unabated, and he continued to devote himself to scientific pursuits, particularly to astronomy, for the advancement of which he deeply lamented that we had no observatory.

Declining the appointment of Surveyor-General of the United States, he accepted the position of Commissioner to examine the Delaware, Schuylkill, Susquehanna, and Juniata rivers and their tributaries, with a view to rendering them navigable. In these and other pioneer works of internal improvement he took a lively interest.

The high character and superior intelligence displayed by Ellicott, in the various spheres he had filled for forty years, placed him among the recognized leaders of science. Therefore it is not surprising that he should have been appointed by President Madison the Professor of Mathematics in the Military Academy, a position he held with credit till his death, Aug. 29, 1820. Unfortunately he was too old to re-create and build up that important branch of instruction.

The Chief Engineer, upon consultation with Bishop Hobart, decided, with the sanction of the Secretary of War, to invite the Rev. Adam Empie, of the Episcopal Church, to take the Chaplaincy of the Military Academy, to which he was appointed Dec. 9, 1813, but did not enter upon duty till May 20, 1814. Before his advent, Captain Partridge, the factotum of the institution, read a sermon on Sunday, which he usually concluded with a summary of the shortcomings of the past week.

ADAM EMPIE, of North Carolina, was a hale, handsome, and scholarly-looking gentleman, of courteous and winning manner, very earnest and devoted to his calling, of moderate culture, and not deficient in eloquence. Having no duties of instruction to perform, after three years' service he left little impress upon the Academy. In addition to his Sunday performances, he made, during the week, prayers at reveille, roll-call, and at evening parade, not unfrequently under circumstances little calculated to inspire devotional feeling in his youthful audience. In the centre of a square open on one side, the "Parson" would reverently kneel down, sometimes in the snow, to offer up his prayer, the cadets standing uncovered.

Mr. Empie resigned April 30, 1817, and became President of William and Mary College, in Virginia.

Subsequently he had the misfortune of becoming totally blind.

Isaac Partridge, the uncle of the Acting Superintendent, was appointed, Jan. 30, 1814, to take charge of the Cadet Commons at West Point, where, says a cadet of that day, "there was nothing attractive, no tablecloths, no glass tumblers, no chairs, and the tables and benches were painted in red ochre, which made its decided impress on coat sleeves and the seat of honour of our trousers." The fare was as unattractive as the furniture. As the extemporized Mess Hall was not spacious enough to accommodate all of the cadets, the overflow was rationed by Mrs. Thompson, the widow of the former Military Storekeeper. Here the fare was a little better, but not over-tempting, as our experience in later years testifies.

The cadets' quarters, the old "Yellow Barracks," situated a little southwest of the present post hotel, were without furnaces or stoves, and deficient in almost every convenience. No wells nor pumps being at hand, water had to be obtained from the natural spring flowing from the hillside. To heat the rooms, wood had to be brought from wherever it could be found, a buck and saw in each room being indispensable. A cadet who passed the winter of 1814-15 at West Point says: "We suffered very much from cold, and had to lie on the floor wrapped in our blankets, and our feet to the fire. Our fires were made from rail-fences, and such dry stuff as we could find in the neighboring woods. We had to cut and haul it ourselves, and sometimes pack it on our backs. We had to forage for a living. It was very difficult to obtain food. We had to buy it of the neighboring farmers and cook it ourselves. A very hard winter."

The prescribed uniform in 1814 was a coat and pantaloons of blue cloth; round hat with black silk cock-ade and gilt eagle; and Jefferson shoes. The coat was single-breasted, with one row of bullet buttons and a standing collar. Little attention, however, was paid to the prescribed dress, everything being worn, according to fancy, up to a major-general's uniform. The belts were black, and the muskets the same as those used by soldiers, except a lighter one for the small boys. Each cadet was expected to wear a sword, but few possessed the weapon.

During the summer of 1814, the cadets, under command of Captain Partridge, made an excursion to Governor's Island, New York Harbor, and were encamped on the glacis of Fort Columbus. While here they were paraded to witness the military execution of a soldier sentenced to death for desertion. Another excursion of three days to New York was made in the summer of 1816, upon the invitation of the city, when the cadets were reviewed by Governor De Witt Clinton.

The Military Academy having little reputation since the revival of the institution, the appointments to cadetships were not much solicited; hence Mr. Monroe, the Acting Secretary of War, the Chief Engineer, and others made strenuous efforts to induce young gentlemen of intelligence and character to go to West Point. Often, two or more of good families were selected to enter the Academy, and some had appointments at the same time as midshipmen in the Navy, to which service some cadets were transferred.

Francis D. Masson, on his return from furlough in Europe, resigned Jan. 3, 1815, as Teacher of French, his place during his absence having been filled by his brother Florimond.

CLAUDIUS BERARD succeeded Mr. Masson as the Teacher of French. He was born, April 12, 1785, at Bordeaux, France, and emigrated to the United States in 1807. He was appointed, in 1812, Professor of Latin and Greek in Dickerson College, Penn., continuing there till he came to West Point. For more than thirty-three years, as Teacher and Professor of French, he faithfully and satisfactorily performed his duties in the Military Academy. He died, Aug. 8, 1848.

During the incumbency of James Monroe, from Sep. 27, 1814, to March 3, 1815, as Acting Secretary of War, he took a warm interest in the Military Academy, and approved of new regulations for its government (doubtless prepared by Captain Partridge to subserve his own ends), but they do not appear to have been enforced, as opposition at once arose on the part of the academic staff, through Professor Ellicott, to the authority there given to a "permanent Superintendent" other than the Chief Engineer, an officer unknown to the law, to "direct the studies" and "all other academic duties;" the academic staff contending, Aug. 1, 1815, that to it "belongs the direction of the studies of the cadets," and "the forming, of necessity, rules and regulations for carrying a system of scientific education into effect," as customary in all the "scientific institutions in either this country or Europe." Professor Ellicott, in a later communication, strongly urged the abandonment of the winter vacations, and the devotion of that season to study, particularly as comfortable new barracks were now ready for occupation.

Since the régime of Captain Partridge began, there had been at West Point a continuous struggle between old and new ideas of intellectual improvement, the vis inertiae of the former having nullified the sagacious views of the law of April 29, 1812, to meliorate and enlarge the curriculum of studies at the Military Academy. That law recognized an "academic staff" and two hundred and sixty cadets to be attached, at the discretion of the President of the United States, "as students to the Military Academy," the former having power to regulate the education of the latter, and to "confer a regular degree" upon any of them before being considered "as among the candidates for a commission in any corps, according to the duties he may be judged competent to perform." In other words, the law bestowed powers as well as imposed duties upon the academic staff, all of which Partridge ignored, believing himself to be the autocrat of the institution, and as Post Commander to be supreme in directing everything, — discipline, police, education, and determining the fitness of cadets for graduation. But the Acting Superintendent was destined to receive an unexpected check in carrying out his eccentric ideas from a young Lieutenant of Engineers, just returned from the field of his fame in the campaign of 1814 on the Niagara, and who had become, Jan. 1, 1815, the Principal Assistant Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy in the Military Academy.

This fresh scientist, Lieut. David B. Douglass, of the Engineers, a graduate of Yale College, where order and system existed, determined, with the aid of the other members of the academic staff, having like views, to use every effort to effect a radical change in educational methods at West Point. The opportunity soon presented itself. He, as senior Engineer in the absence of Captain Partridge, persuaded himself that it was proper to do wrong, in usurping power not belonging to a temporary commander, to accomplish a great good to the Military Academy. Accordingly, so soon as Partridge had left West Point for Washington, Douglass, Oct. 30, 1815, issued a circular requesting the "Professors, the Assistant Professors, and Teachers of the Military Academy, as a body, to deliberate on the propriety of arranging a course of study for the Academy, and of casting the cadets into grades, according to their progress in that course; also on the propriety of drawing up a code of regulations for the government of the academic staff in their professional duties, and on such other subjects connected with the interests of the staff as they might think proper."

The academic staff met that evening, agreed upon a general outline of a course of study, and recommended a classification of cadets by means of an examination which Douglass, the next day, ordered to be held at once. After a continuance of this examination for nine days, eighty-two of the cadets were reported as "not qualified agreeably to law to enter upon the academic course," though its requirements were very small. Douglass's reign as Acting Superintendent was short, but it produced good fruit. Though Partridge, on his return, disapproved of all his subordinate's proceedings, he, in December following, ordered an examination to take place before an invited Board of Visitors, which practically adopted Douglass's views. Accordingly, an order was issued by the Chief Engineer to the Acting Superintendent and academic staff to prepare and recommend a course of instruction.

The new Mess Hall, Academic Building, and South Barracks were completed this year (1815), and the North Barracks two years later. These were substantial stone buildings without any architectural beauty, but they were a great improvement upon what had before existed. The Academic Building was burned, Feb. 19, 1838, with all the records of the post and Academy, and the other structures were demolished in 1849-52. With them vanished many happy memories of "auld lang syne," leaving nothing to recall the past to old graduates save the South Barracks pump, which still supplies its thirsty customers with delicious water.

The late war with Great Britain had left the Government treasury so depleted that there were no funds with which to carry on the Academy. Under these circumstances, by authority of the Secretary of War, the Chief Engineer tried to negotiate a loan from the New York banks to relieve the pressing necessities at West Point; but they not being satisfied with the security, he applied to Jacob Barker, a wealthy merchant, who advanced $65,000 at seven per cent. interest, thereby preventing the disbandment of the Military Academy.

In 1815, but forty-seven new cadets had been appointed, and forty-one of the old ones were graduated at various dates from March to December. The graduates of the latter month were examined before three invited gentlemen, of whom were Dr. Samuel L. Mitchell, late a Member of Congress, and De Witt Clinton, then Mayor of New York city. The latter, in his report of Feb. 1, 1816, of which I have only a fragment, says: "In the Military Academy no previous examination is required for the admission of cadets; they are not divided into classes; a course of studies is not prescribed; nor is a final examination, which is stamped with the approbation of their preceptors, considered an essential passport to military promotion: the consequences are, that young gentlemen ignorant of the first elements of science are admitted, that perhaps a majority of the cadets do not attend any of the professors, and that selections for the Army are sometimes considered in an unfavourable light."

This deplorable condition of things in the Military Academy and other irregularities at the post of West Point, becoming known to Secretary Crawford, who had succeeded to the War Department, he saw that a remedy for existing evils was imperatively called for, and that a change must be made in the command at West Point. Doubtless it was then, if not earlier,¹

decided to appoint either Colonel McRee or Major Thayer, both on professional duty in Europe, to succeed Partridge, though Thayer was not officially designated till the autumn of 1816.

The importance of military education had been so fully demonstrated by the late war with Great Britain that President Madison, in his annual Message of Dec. 5, 1815, strongly urged "an enlargement of the Military Academy, and the establishment of others in sections of the Union." Bills for creating these latter were introduced into Congress, but fortunately received no decisive action, thereby leaving us with a single Military Academy, producing uniformity of instruction for the Army, a common chord of sympathy in the whole service, and that strong bond of comradeship which even the rude shock of civil war could not sunder.

The Academy re-opened in April, 1816, with less than two hundred cadets. On April 6, the academic staff met, and decided upon a course of studies and the necessary rules for arranging the cadets, according to qualifications, to form four annual classes, with the studies of each year. With a view to this classification, one hundred and nineteen old cadets were examined, April 8; and fifty-four new cadets presented themselves for an examination in writing, orthography, and arithmetic, many failing therein. Out of these proceedings doubtless grew the Regulations of May 22, 1816, which were approved by Secretary Crawford, July 2, 1816.

nected with this contemplated work, or on some other duty that would relieve him from West Point. My reply to this was, that to displace Captain Partridge suddenly, and without assigning the cause, would not be just to his official rights. The President assented to the correctness of this, but said: 'Captain Partridge is not deemed by the Secretary of War the most suitable officer of Engineers for duty at the Academy.' I called immediately on the Secretary of War and stated these circumstances. He said the matter would be considered further, and, though he should not interfere with any order in reference thereto, he would prefer that I should send some officer of Engineers to relieve Captain Partridge."

These excellent Regulations are too long to be inserted here in full. They required increased qualifications for admission, and prescribed a course of four years of studies in the following branches: the English and French languages, and review of Latin and Greek, if previously acquired; Mathematics up to Fluxions, which latter were to be taught and studied at the option of the professor and student; Drawing of figures, fortifications, and topographical plans; Philosophy, embracing mechanics, hydraulics, pneumatics, optics, chemistry, magnetism, and astronomy; Engineering, embracing field and permanent fortifications, attack and defense of places, mines, and castrametation; Geography, with the use of globes and maps; Ethics, comprising moral science, and natural and political law; Military Instruction, embracing infantry and artillery tactics, practical gunnery, and camp duties; and Broad and Small Sword Exercise. All graduation was to be according to merit, and a diploma given; no cadet leaving the Academy was to be promoted till all of his classmates were provided for; and dismissed cadets could not receive appointments in the Army till five years after the promotion of their graduating classmates.

These Regulations seem never to have been enforced at the Academy, as Captain Partridge put every obstacle in the way to prevent any division of authority. The wrestling between him and the academic staff for their respective prerogatives continued till it became a chronic feud.

The uniform of the cadets, slightly differing from the present dress, was adopted Sep. 4, 1816. General Winfield Scott claimed that the change was made in compliment to his regiment, which had fought so gallantly in 1814 at Chippewa and Lundy's Lane in gray habiliments, because there was no blue cloth to be obtained for the regulation uniform when going into campaign. The change was fortunate, for no color is so well adapted for rough usage, and concealment from the enemy in the field, as gray.

Owing to the condition of affairs at West Point, and for other reasons unnecessary here to state, General Swift was ordered to take personal command of the Military Academy. Upon his arrival at the post, the academic staff welcomed him in a flattering written address signed by each of its members, to which the General replied in fitting phrase, Nov. 25, 1816, the day he assumed command. After seven weeks of faithful performance of his duties, he returned, Jan. 13, 1817, to Washington, leaving Captain Partridge again in charge of the Academy.

During the year 1816, not a single cadet was graduated, none probably having completed the prescribed course of studies.

The knell of Partridge's administration was sounded, May 1, 1817, upon the return from Europe of Major Thayer, preparatory to his taking command of the Military Academy, July 28, 1817. It was high time for the change in the management of the institution, for during Partridge's régime, while three hundred and eighty-three cadets had been admitted to it, but ninety-one half-educated pupils, or less than twenty-five per cent., had been graduated therefrom. Further, all progress was paralyzed, most of the academic staff being in arrest, some on trial, and the remaining officials at West Point in bitter antagonism to the commanding officer. Upon President Monroe's visit to West Point in June, 1817, "it was determined that Captain Partridge should be brought before a court martial in reference to his disagreement with the professors."¹ representatives, made, April 2, 1822, by John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, he says: "The Military Academy may be considered as having been in its infancy until the close of 1817, or beginning of 1818, prior to which there was little system or regularity. Cadets were admitted without examination, and without the least regard to their age or qualifications, as required by the law of 1812. Hence the institution was filled with students who were more or less unfit for their situations. It is not surprising, therefore, that a large portion of them have been under the necessity of leaving the Academy without completing their education. In support of these statements, it may be observed that in 1817, at which time the present Superintendent [Major Thayer] took charge of the Academy, there were 213 cadets, of whom 103 have resigned or been discharged, whose names will be found on the list marked A; of the 179 on that list, 122 left the Academy in consequence of being deficient in their studies, and nine were dismissed or compelled to resign in consequence of bad conduct. None of the others can be considered as a loss to the Academy, or to the public service."

SUMMARY.

IMMEDIATELY following the declaration of war against Great Britain, the Second Period of the existence of the Military Academy began. Every honorable effort had been made by the President to avoid the contest, but, as stated by Joel Barlow in his prospectus of a National Institution, to be established in the United States, "Although the principle has long since been known, that good laws faithfully executed within a State would protect the industry of men, and preserve interior tranquillity, yet no method was discovered which would effectually preserve exterior tranquillity between State and State. Treaties were made, oaths were exacted, the name of God was invoked, forts, garrisons, and armies were established on their respective frontiers; all with the sincere desire, no doubt, of preserving peace."

The experience of all nations having shown the fallacy of relying upon these precautions, the only safe remedy was in peace to prepare for war. This maxim was grossly ignored by Secretary Eustis, who, for three years preceding hostilities, while directing the War Department, had disregarded every precaution to meet the impending conflict, especially that of having a sufficient supply of educated officers to carry on military operations. Even after the enactment of the law of April 29, 1812, providing for 260 cadets, he failed to appoint a single one.

ORGANIZATION. — Though Congress had authorized the remodeling of the Military Academy with a respectable staff, the institution may be said to have had no methodizing from 1812 to 1817, but to have been governed solely by the arbitrary will of the narrow-minded Acting Superintendent.

Though the law made ample provision for a large body of cadets, the greatest number in any one year (1814) was 220, and the average from 1812 to 1817 about half that number, only 347 having been appointed in these five years. Even for this small assemblage of cadets, of whom but 91 were graduated during that period and 83 subsequently, the academic staff was inadequate for their thorough instruction in the various branches of study.

The library and apparatus, for which large appropriations had been made, still remained ill-provided, but the accommodations for officers and cadets continued to improve.

thy with scientific education, but, absorbed in weighty cares of state and in the conduct of a war with one of the colossal powers of the earth, he had necessarily to devolve the charge of Military Academy affairs upon his Secretaries of War. Of Eustis we have said enough to show his utter neglect of duty. After that millstone was removed, General Armstrong, a man of marked ability, succeeded to the War Department, but he was chiefly occupied with planning and conducting campaigns and wrangling with other generals, till his fiasco of the defense of the capital, in 1814, drove him from office. His ad interim successor, James Monroe, though much interested in the Military Academy, could do little for the rickety institution during the less than six months of his incumbency of the War Department. Finally came William H. Crawford, a statesman of broad views, who, in his fifteen months as Secretary of War, initiated many reforms at West Point, culminating in the cure of the greatest evils by a change of Superintendents.

MILITARY SUPERVISION. — The Chief Engineer, ex-officio Superintendent of the Academy, being absent from West Point, except from Nov. 25, 1816 to Jan. 13, 1817, the command devolved upon Captain Alden Partridge, the senior engineer present. His government was that of a post commander, and not that of the head of a great educational institution, for which he had neither training nor capacity. He assumed to be sole governor in everything, from drilling a squad to usurping the entire functions of the whole academic staff, upon which, by law, devolved the decision of the fitness of cadets for graduation, "after going through all the classes," and showing competency to become commissioned officers of the Army.

The late General Harvey Brown, a cadet under Partridge, in a letter to me thus sketches the Captain:

“He was unfitted by nature and education for such a command. He was narrow and contracted in his views, and, without any knowledge of the world, he was better fitted for a professor than for the command of a great National Institution. He was well read for that day, and was, I think, a strictly moral man, but without the dignity of a gentleman or the bearing of a soldier. His house was small, and his meals were cooked out, and served by a man who was his woman of all work. He was never known to dispense the hospitalities of the post, even to giving a cup of cold water. He was strictly temperate, and conducted the religious services on Sunday in the absence of the Chaplain. He visited the rooms of the cadets daily, and the mess-room now and then. I do not think Captain Partridge ever commanded the respect of the cadets, or was a subject of hatred. He went by the quaint name of ‘Old Pewter,’ and the prison-room walls were covered with caricatures of him.”

REGULATIONS. — Colonel Williams’s Regulations for the Military Academy, approved April 30, 1810, were the only ones in existence, till the intrigue and ambition of Captain Partridge secured, Jan. 3, 1815, from the Acting Secretary of War, James Monroe, his sanction to the Captain’s recognition as “Permanent Superintendent of the Military Academy,” the legal permanent Superintendent being the Chief Engineer, who was shorn of his office to become simply the “Inspector of the Institution.”

These regulations were soon after, Feb. 28, 1815, modified, and directed that “from the Inspector only, the Superintendent of the Academy will receive orders, and to him only will the Superintendent make all returns and communications pertaining to the Institution.”

In 1816, Partridge drafted “an act making further provision for the Military Academy," which contained many good features, but the prominent one was the provision to make himself the Autocrat of the Academy under the sole direction of the President of the United States. Of this draft Congress does not appear to have taken any notice.

The next regulations were those approved, July 2, 1816, by Secretary Crawford, which, as before stated, seem never to have gone into effect.

ADMISSION OF CADETS. — No attention seems to have been paid, in the admission of cadets, to the law of April 29, 1812. Many were under the minimum age of fourteen, one had but a single arm, and another was married before entering the institution, and one was married while at West Point. All were admitted without physical examination, and many had not the educational requirements, as proved by the examination held in November, 1815, by order of Captain Douglass, which showed that eighty-two "were not qualified agreeably to law to enter upon the studies of the academic course;" and "twenty not present on account of ill health or absence from the Academy." At a subsequent general examination, held in September, 1817, after Partridge's régime had terminated, General Thayer, in a letter to me, says: "Many on the list, who were admitted in 1813 and 1814 and subsequently, were found not to possess the requisites for admission. It appears also by the same list that during the whole of this period there were no fixed times for admission, and that among the dates of admission will be found every month of the year, and almost every day in each month. For instance, opposite the names of the eighty-three on the list admitted in 1814, being about half of the whole number admitted in that year, will be seen eleven different months and seventy different days, the admissions being pretty equally distributed throughout the year. The same latitude of admission in 1813-15 and 1816."

INSTRUCTION. — There being no annual classes, no regular course of studies, no standard of attainment, in any branch, and the academic staff being practically ignored, instruction, except in infantry and artillery drills, was at a low ebb at the Academy during Partridge's administration.

The French Language was in effect a voluntary study, and not a requisite for graduation. Not one in ten of the cadets, as shown by the examination in September, 1817, could translate with tolerable facility the easiest French author.

Drawing was also a voluntary study, very few paying any attention to it whatever.

Engineering was less attended to than French or Drawing, the greater number of cadets on graduating never having gone beyond the definitions to be found in Colonel Williams's little primer of fifty pages on the subject, which was their only text-book. Many cadets scarce knew the difference between the ditch and the glacis of a fort, save by the conventional colors adopted in their delineation. It is said that two cadets were graduated in 1815 in the Engineer Corps whose studies never extended beyond Hutton's Trigonometry.

During the brief period after March 6, 1817, when Crozet became Professor of Engineering, his instruction was oral and confined to subsidiary problems of Descriptive Geometry, to which very few of his pupils paid any attention, it "being Greek to them."

Mathematics, the most important branch of instruction, was very elementary. Many of the cadets of that period I have often heard speak, jestingly, of the good old times when "they graduated upon the rule of three, and never had to pass the Pons Asinorum of Geometry."

Natural and Experimental Philosophy was still more elementary in its teaching, not a few graduates leaving the Academy without any instruction whatever therein. The only apparatus in the professor's possession, to illustrate his subject, was a field transit-instrument and a clock.

Tactics of Infantry and Artillery were Captain Partridge's delight, and were well taught, but were necessarily limited, owing to the small number of cadets to exercise and the few pieces of ordnance for drill and target practice. He often gave lectures upon Grand Tactics and Strategy, illustrated by the history of noted campaigns, though most of his eloquence was lost on his inattentive hearers.

CLASSIFICATION. — There was none, nor could there be any, owing to the irregularity of admission and promotion of cadets, and the lack of any standard of qualification for advancement from one study to another. Final graduation was much dependent upon the age, size, and wishes of cadets, and the caprice of the Acting Superintendent.

DISCIPLINE was strict, but not impartial. There being no courts martial, punishments, decreed by the Acting Superintendent, who was both judge and executioner, were extra guard and police duty; confinement to quarters, guard-house, and black-hole, subsisting on soldiers' rations; and not unfrequently riding astride a cannon in the hot sun for several hours.

There was little dissipation and no gambling among the cadets, but they would steal away for suppers at "Old North's" or "Benny Haven's," though the risk was great, as Partridge made his round of inspection every day and sometimes at night. Chapel attendance was expected, but not rigidly enforced. High sentiments of honor prevailed among cadets, who, of their own action, expelled two for lying. Malingering was infrequent, and real sickness little known; hence Surgeon Walsh, nicknamed "Doctor Salts," had little to do in his uncomfortable log hospital under the hill.

GRADUATION. — There was no fixed period for graduation. In 1813, a single cadet was graduated, his promotion taking place in six months after entering the Academy; in 1814, there were thirty-one graduated in the months from March to July; in 1815, forty were graduated at four different periods of the year; in 1816, there was not a single graduate; and in 1817, of the twenty graduates, one was promoted in April and the others in July. The period during which the graduates from 1813 to 1817 were at the Academy varied from six months to four years, the average probation being less than two years.

CONCLUSION. — From the foregoing narrative of the Second Period of the Military Academy's history, it is evident that under Captain Partridge the institution decidedly retrograded from its standing in 1809, when William Eustis became Secretary of War. This obstruction to all progress being removed in 1812, and the law of that year making ample provision for the welfare of the institution, its advancement should have been marked. The civil administration of the Academy was doubtless affected by the existence of hostilities with Great Britain, and frequent changes in the control of the War Department; but, with a proper Military Superintendent, it ought to have become an institution worthy of the nation. That its bad condition till 1817 was mainly due to its commanding officer is fully evidenced by the magic change in its character wrought with the same aids and appliances by his successor, Major Thayer, a soldier and a scholar.

The following sketch of Cadet Life in the early days of the Military Academy is so graphic that I append it to this chapter. The writer, General GEORGE D. RAM-SAY, became Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, Sep. 15, 1863, and, having reached fourscore years, died at the city of Washington, May 23, 1882.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE CADET LIFE OF GEORGE D. RAMSAY.

I was appointed a cadet on the 4th May, 1814, by General John Armstrong, Secretary of War during the administration of Mr. Madison. My family had but recently removed to Washington from Virginia, in which State I was born on the 21st February, 1802, and consequently was but a little over twelve years of age when the appointment was conferred upon me. My education consisted of some little knowledge of Latin and Greek. I had read Cæsar's Commentaries, Sallust, and had made some little progress in the Greek grammar. Of mathematics I knew nothing.

The appointment was conferred upon me unsolicited, and without conditions of any kind that I now remember; even the time of my joining the Academy was, I believe, left to the convenience of my father.

After being duly provided with what was deemed a suitable outfit (and I well remember the ruffled shirts with large falling collars, two uniform coats of blue cloth, — one short, intended for daily wear, the other long-tailed, for full dress, — a round black hat ornamented with silk cockade and yellow eagle, etc.), I left home during the following month of August, under the charge of a friend, for West Point, which, at that time of stage-coach supremacy, was no short journey, and quite an undertaking for one so young and without any experience whatever as a traveler.

Leaving Washington early in the morning, breakfasting and dining on the road, we reached Baltimore about twilight, after what had seemed to me to be an interminable journey; and three days thereafter, via Lancaster and Philadelphia, we reached New York, and took lodgings at the American Hotel, Broadway. On being recognized as a cadet from the uniform I wore, I was informed that the "Corps" (not then so called) was encamped on Governor's Island, and, meeting during the day with some cadet friends, I was readily induced to accompany them with bag and baggage on their return to camp; and thus, in the month of August, 1814, in the camp on Governor's Island, commenced my cadet life.

There were no preliminaries connected with my initiation. I presume that I was presented to Captain Partridge, but of the ceremony I have no recollection. I became by his invitation an inmate of the tent of a cadet friend, and enjoyed for the first time the youthful delight of sleeping under canvas. I was, of course, but a looker-on, not joining in any duty save the never-to-be-neglected one of attending mess. I regularly and without special assignment fell into the squad to which my friend belonged, and to which we were summoned by "Peas upon the Trencher," or its fellow melody, "Roast Beef," and with both of which I soon became familiar.

The cadets, under the command of Captain Alden Partridge, of the Corps of Engineers, and Superintendent of the Military Academy, had come from West Point to Governor's Island on a short war visit of observation, and for practical military instruction in camp duties, etc. The opportunity thus afforded of mingling with and becoming, though temporarily, a part of so large a garrison in a state of war, infused in the cadets a spirit of martial ardor and desire for active service, and most willingly would they have remained and "fought it out," if need be, until the close of the war not far distant. During their short sojourn on the island, the cadets were encamped on the extended glacis of Fort Columbus, and were subjected to the duties and orders of the garrison, regularly mounting guard, etc. There was no cooking in camp, and the transport sloop which had conveyed the "corps" to the island answered the purpose of a mess hall, and I have a lively recollection of the difficulties and discomfort which attended the messing. A few rough boards extending from side to side in the deep and capacious hull served the purpose of tables, at which squads in rotation were served with the coarsest kind of fare. I remember well the difficulties which fell to my lot, as I was so short of stature that my chin was just even with the table, and it required on my part a good deal of tiptoe dexterity to secure even a moiety of my allowance.

The day after my arrival became memorable by the military execution of a soldier who had been by a court-martial adjudged guilty of desertion, and sentenced to undergo the ultima ratio of military punishment.

The execution in the presence of the entire garrison, including the cadets, and all under arms, took place in close proximity to the cadet camp, and all were deeply impressed by the enactment of this unusual and very sad drama, and I well remember the painful excitement it occasioned a very youthful sentinel whose midnight round was near the grave. He made, and in vain, every effort to obtain a substitute, and even appealed to me to take his place on guard, and backed his appeal by the seductive offer of a dollar, all of which I declined, on the plea of not being eligible for the duty, but no doubt for the graver reason that I was as unwilling as himself to encounter, by the "glimpses of the moon," the "questionable shape" of the poor deserter.

"Hazing" was but little known at this early day; but it was well authenticated that a ghost had been seen stalking about the camp on the night of the execution by affrighted and inexperienced sentinels.

The brief campaign soon drew to a close, and the tents were at early dawn struck with precision under the enlivening influence of "Strike your tents and march away."

The homeward voyage of the transport sloop was my first experience on shipboard, and if I had entertained any fears as to "the dangers of the seas," they were soon dispelled by the gentle and favorable breezes which wafted us on amid such scenes of beauty.

At this period, sloops, the then characteristic craft of the Hudson, were in the ascendant, and only three steamboats — the Hudson and Fulton, plying between New York and Albany, and the Firefly between New York and Newburg, — gladdened the waters of the Hudson. Our "flagship" afforded but scanty accommodation for so large a party, and it did not turn out that the quantity or quality of the provisions had undergone a favorable change for this day upon the waters; but this mattered little amid so much of rollicking good-humor, and we reached our destination, the Point, just as the sun was peeping his last adieus over Cro' Nest. The impatient landing was soon effected, and without regard to the order of going, and, once on shore, the mess halls became the objective points.

I had at length reached my new home, but homeless, and my first evening's introduction to it, however profitable in the long run, was anything but encouraging.

There were two mess halls: the one under the hill, for a limited number of cadets, was presided over by the venerable Mrs. Thompson, who lived to an advanced age, and was well known to many generations of cadets; the other mess hall was on the Plain, near the present quarters of the Superintendent, and was kept by the recognized Steward of the Academy, Mr. Isaac Partridge, a connection of Captain Partridge. The sauve qui peut seemed to be the order of the evening; and as I was "unassigned" and knew not where to go, I followed in the rush to Mrs. Thompson's, where I was told to go on to the Partridge hall; and on making my appearance at its crowded portals, I found my reception by no means more cordial, and I was rudely hustled out. It seemed to me no occasion to extend courtesy to a stranger, and more especially to a hungry one, where supper was by no means assured, and where "Number One" appeared to be the prominent and favored guest. For a first appearance on the stage of West Point, and without rehearsal, it was by no means encouraging to a diffident, modest, and homesick youth; and I fell back upon the now deserted Plain, filled, not with supper, but with emotions of despair. Luckily for me, at once and with wonder, I became absorbed with the surpassing beauty of the surroundings, and as I stood alone, unconsciously drinking in the influence of the silent scene, I must have fully realized that which has since been so beautifully written, "a thing of beauty is a joy forever," — a joy which clung to me in all its original loveliness during the many years I basked within its influence. This little episode of romance did not, it must be acknowledged, cause me to altogether forget my supper, in pursuit of which I wandered on until I found myself returned to the now deserted banquet hall of Mrs. Thompson, and indebted to the kind offices of the mâîtresse d'hôtel, Souverine. I was furnished with an abundant supper from what, fortunately for me, had not been devoured by my hungry "brothers-in-arms." Souverine, called by the cadets "Shoverin," was a decided character and prominent feature in the mess, where she did the honors of chief waitress. By birth a creole of St. Domingo, full of French vivacity and with an amusing patois, she was always at meals a source of mirth, and kept up a lively encounter of wit with the young cadets, who generally came under Mrs. Thompson's care. It sometimes happened that the merriment would reach the vigilant ears of Mrs. Thompson, when the good old lady would swoop down upon us with a lecture on good behavior, which was always received with becoming deference. In addition to Souverine, our colored population in 1814-15 included "Black George" and family, and their presence not unfrequently carried me back in affectionate remembrance to "Old Virginia."

Casting my fortunes at Mrs. Thompson's, I soon became initiated into the etiquette and usage of that polite caravansary; and I now write of that era of two-pronged forks, and when "saveall" was the choicest dish, and the observances at the table not altogether Chesterfieldian. We marched to and from meals, but no roll-call was observed, as I suppose it could not then have been believed that any one would willingly absent himself on such occasions; not that the meals were at all inviting, but viewed as a necessity by ever-hungry cadets.

We had, I must confess, some rather reprehensible practices at mess, and particularly, during the winter, of carrying from the table the sinews of war for a barrack-room supper, usually called "hooking." Bread, butter, sugar, etc., would by concerted action be spirited away, and after "taps," when everybody was presumed to be in bed, the cooking at the appointed rendezvous would commence and in due time the supper served. As a rare thing, a turkey or chicken would lend its welcome aid. This system continued even after the mess hall on the Plain was built and occupied, and it was found very difficult to break it up. In this connection, I remember an amusing incident in front of this mess hall. It happened on a day that an unusual subsidy had been levied on the table; and to the surprise of all in coming out, the battalion was halted and formed into line. A suspicion of search ran through the ranks, when there at once commenced a vigorous fire to the rear, and a well-defined third line of bread and potatoes sprung up. "Hooking" was not considered at all disreputable, and had its origin doubtless in the universities, and at times in not over-wholesome food presented at the mess hall. I remember when a mess-hall steward, Divins by name (and probably in 1816), kept a flock of sheep, among which a disease known as the rot prevailed, and which were, in this repulsive condition, it was currently believed, served at dinner; and on one occasion, as we marched into dinner and discovered on the tables the ever-present mutton, we were seized with a feeling of disgust, and without preconcerted action marched round the tables and out of doors. This muttonous prompt manœuvre was construed into mutinous by Captain Partridge, who was always on hand, and caused us to return to the mess halls, when some compromise was made with the steward, and bread, butter, and molasses substituted as a peace-offering. This flock of sheep held the undisputed pasturage of the Plain, and it was a lucky straggler found near the precipitous cliffs that escaped being hurled into the depths below. In this war of extermination the cadets became expert, and the flock was thus more than decimated. The sheep speculation fortunately proved a failure, and there was no further revenons à nos moutons. During my time, the mess hall was always indifferent, if not positively bad, — certainly always below what should have been the proper standard. There was nothing attractive: no tablecloths, no glass tumblers, no chairs, and the tables and benches were painted in red ochre, which made its impress on the sleeves of our gray uniform coats, and on the unmentionable seats of honor of our trowsers.

One of my poetical classmates addressed an ode to mess hall in parody of "Hohenlinden," the following stanza of which comes to my remembrance : —

Few, few shall fat-en where many eat,
Where pickled pork 's their choicest meat,
And every crust to them is sweet,
That live estranged from luxury.

Having slipped unbidden into the ranks on Governor's Island, I felt myself, with my wonderful military experience of a week or two, quite a campaigner, on reaching the Point. I was assigned to quarters in barracks, was soon supplied with arms and accoutrements, and could be seen any morning at reveille roll-call at the extreme end of the line, as diminutive in person as if viewed through the reverse end of a telescope.

My room-mates, to whom I was so much indebted, were all Virginians; and with one exception "old cadets," as those were called who had been a year or two at the Academy; and it required but short probation, for those who were deemed old enough, to obtain commissions in the various arms of the military service. These were "the cadets of our time, who graduated in the rule of three," as was once given in a toast on some festive occasion at the Point by Colonel James Monroe, one of them so well known and respected, and who was one of my Virginia room-mates referred to. This was near the close of the War of 1812-14, when a little military knowledge passed for a heap, combined as it was with a high sense of military discipline and esprit de corps, and these "rule of three graduates" won for themselves distinction, and were among the foremost to give renown to the Military Academy.

The barracks of 1814-15 stood upon the site of the present hotel, — a building in length about two hundred and fifty feet, — and was known as the Yellow Barracks, although, at the time, all the buildings on the Point were painted yellow. It consisted of two stories with wings, with corresponding centre of intermediate proportions. The upper floor was reached by a high flight of steps with "stoops." The rooms were large, but without any conveniences. There were no wells or pumps, and the water for drinking and washing was derived from the natural springs flowing from the hillside, and I well remember how slippery and dangerous these hillsides were in the cold winter mornings, when creeping down, "jug" in hand, it was difficult to maintain one's foothold. The duty of water-carrier generally devolved upon me by virtue of my juvenility, as did the privilege of making the fires, sweeping the room, shoveling the snow, and all other small "chores," as they were called round about us, necessary to my complete military education, and which from my inaptitude, it was thought, had been neglected. In time, I became an earnest worker, and after having been taught how by a Vermont room-mate, I found it quite a pleasure to make in early morning a rousing wood-fire, and I would often get up before reveille for this purpose. There were no furnaces or stoves, and wood was burned in open fireplaces — sawed and split and brought to the barrack rooms by their respective occupants; a "saw and buck" in each room was indispensable. This practice continued, to include the winter of 1818, if not afterward, and I well remember what a severe task it was to carry up the wood, often covered with snow, to the third floor of the South Barracks, and this amusement, as a general thing, so as not to interfere with the duties of the day, generally fell upon us after supper. The sawing came afterward.

My subsequent experience induces me to acknowledge the great benefit I derived from this practical and useful system of training; it certainly has served me many a good turn; and it tends in my eye to make labor respectable. During the winters of 1814–15, cadets were greatly exposed to the cold. Greatcoats had not become the fashion for boys, and such a comfort was a specialty. My wardrobe had been carefully prepared, but the inventory did not include a greatcoat. I never knew Captain Partridge to wear one, and he was out in all weathers; and as to umbrellas, there was not one in 1814 at the Point, in my belief; and even as late as 1820, Major Worth declared that an offender seen with an umbrella should be dismissed the military service.

During the winters of 1814–16, there were regular vacations from the 1st of December to the 31st of March, when the general academic duties were suspended, although a portion of the cadets were retained at the Point. Those who remained had to attend prescribed roll-calls and recitations. The younger cadets had to exhibit on Sunday morning at the Academy, to Professor Ellicott, manuscripts in which were recorded the tasks in arithmetic which he had on the preceding Sunday marked out for the week's study. No examination was had as to the manner of obtaining results; but if the manuscripts were neat and presentable, we were treated like good little boys, and patted on the head. Of course we gave ourselves up pretty much to the manuscripts, and let the arithmetic take care of itself. Having joined the Academy in August, 1814, I remained at the Point during the ensuing vacation as a matter of preference, which I had no reason to regret. The more serious restrictions of the Academy were thrown aside, and we had every reasonable indulgence granted, and the principal duties we had to perform were rendered an agreeable and instructive pastime. Captain Partridge was very fond of artillery practice, and during this vacation he would often turn us out with bricole and drag-rope, and, without regard to the depth of snow, hitch us to and drag an 18-pounder to the river, and there practice ricochet-firing on the ice in the direction of Newburg. We were each instructed, and had a chance to fire, occasioning great rivalry. We became expert artillerists, and I benefited more by this practice and the knowledge obtained than at any future period. With us, the deeper the snow, the greater the fun and enjoyment. The hauling down to the river was comparatively an easy matter; but retracing our steps with snow up to the waist was the hic labor, hoc opus est, which tried our mettle. I remember that on one occasion the snow was too much for us; and a gun that became snowbound, on ascending the hill near the chestnuts, had to await the thaw of spring before we could get it back to the park on the Plain.

Captain Partridge was well versed in the science of artillery and in its practice, and he was for the day an accomplished tactician. He was passionately fond of field exercises, and often combined with the battalion drills dissertations on the formation of armies, and taught us how great battles had been won. In these flying lectures he was interesting and instructive, and beguiled many an hour usually given to monotonous drill. This fondness for drilling was so much a part of his nature that it was no uncommon thing to see him, musket in hand, drilling a squad.

The vacations — which absorbed the best part of the year as adapted to study, the winter — were the result of necessity rather than a boon to indulgence. The close of the War of 1812 left the treasury in an impoverished condition, and consequently every species of economy had to be practiced in the administration of the public service. The cost of fuel during the winter months was even a consideration, and one which exercised an influence in promoting vacations. The scholastic progress of the Academy was thus materially retarded, and consequently much more of attention was given to practical soldiering in all of the arms of service, with the exception of cavalry and horse artillery, which cost nothing comparatively, than the scientific pursuits, which involved the expense of professors, books, and instruments. The library consisted of but few miscellaneous works, and the philosophical apparatus was limited, and only adapted to elementary instruction. . . .

The vacations of 1814–16 embraced many privileges to those who remained at the Academy. We were for the greater part good skaters, and in high practice on pond and river, and, apart from our limited official obligations, we amused ourselves in this and in other outdoor pastimes.

Buttermilk Falls was a favorite resort, and prior to the vacation we made acquaintance with the head of the house of Benny Havens, who was authorized to deal with cadets, for which purpose he made weekly visits on Saturdays to the dock with a boat freighted with shoes, pens, ink, paper, and such small necessities as we stood in need of, in the absence of any other trading establishment. Everything was on the square; assumedly no spirituous liquors were introduced; nor, indeed, was it the habit of cadets to indulge in them. When allowed to go “beyond the walls,” and the public domain was much more circumscribed than now, there was no restriction, and Havens’s was the Delmonico’s for dinners, especially on Saturdays, and for suppers of buckwheat cakes and molasses. There were other resorts for buckwheat cakes and apple-pies, — the most attractive, the house of Mrs. Kinsley, which at that time was encompassed by a wilderness of rocks, and called by cadets “Stonylonesome.” Mrs. Kinsley had a son, a cadet, who subsequently was Assistant Instructor of Tactics at the Academy in 1820, and of Artillery in 1823. Mrs. Kinsley also rejoiced in a houseful of very pretty daughters, one of whom married a Cadet Pratt, who with his cousin, Billy Johnson, nephew to "Old Tecumseh," and Payne, came as cadets all the way from Kentucky on horseback to West Point, fetching all of their worldly goods in saddle-bags. At that time, Kentucky was an almost terra incognita, and the advent of these three gallant Lochinvars, who had come out from the West, was a subject quite worthy of Mr. James; and nothing could have excited more the wonder of the cadets. No one had before imagined that West Point was accessible to the "Far West" by the Simplon pass of Cro' Nest. Our geographical views became much enlarged. Payne subsequently lost his arm by the premature discharge of a 12-pounder gun on the occasion of firing a salute. A short time thereafter, this Kentucky trio resigned and went home. Billy Johnson was considered a genius in mathematics. Pratt, of this trio, had a rival in the affections of Miss Kinsley in the person of Lieut. George W. Gardiner, Post Adjutant, called by the cadets the "Little God of War" [a gallant soldier, killed by the Indians in Dade's Massacre]. Gardiner was of diminutive size, but every inch a soldier, and one that few men would have cared to encounter. Pratt, however, smarting under some supposed invasion of his pretensions to the fair lady, and regardless of consequences, proceeded to the Lieutenant's quarters to "beard the lion in his den," when Gardiner seized a pair of tongs, in the jaws of which he embraced Pratt's neck, and gave to the tongs such a twist as to render their removal no easy matter. It was thought a very funny adventure; but nothing more serious grew out of it than Pratt's marriage.

The accident to Payne calls to mind another, and which proved fatal. Cadet Vincent M. Lowe, who was held in high estimation, was killed during the year 1817 by the accidental discharge of a gun [in firing a New Year's salute]. The Cadets' Monument had its origin in his death, each cadet paying fifteen dollars.

I might add, under the head of vacations, that the classes, such as they were, were not altogether neglected. Professor Mansfield instructed some of the older and more advanced cadets in a course of Natural and Experimental Philosophy and in Astronomy. In 1814-15, but little attention was paid to the general instruction of the younger cadets; they were submitted chiefly to the care of the Teacher of French, Mr. Florimond Mason, a rather distinguished-looking French gentleman of military port, and, as I remember him, in a blue coat, and white cassimere pantaloons, over which he wore long and always brightly polished boots. The instruction consisted in reading aloud for the accent, and in writing for the orthography from dictation. But an hour or two a day was given to this instruction, and it amounted to but little.

The general parade ground where all parades were held was on the Plain, in front of the present quarters of the Superintendent. There was no company parade in 1814, although I am under the impression that the guard was habitually turned off in the barrack-yard. On the beating of the call, the whole body would move promiscuously to the grand parade, and would fall in and be ranked and sized by the Cadet Adjutant, who came next to Captain Partridge in the exercise of authority. The parade formed by the Adjutant, the command would be assumed by the Officer of the Day, who also paraded, and called the roll of all classes, and reported delinquents. The evening parade was the only occasion, when the battalion was formed, that Captain Partridge did not command as a matter of course. There was no Commandant of Cadets, as Instructor of Tactics, before 1818. Captain Partridge, during the interval from 1814 to 1817, was Commander, Professor, teaching all branches then taught, and, when need be, Chaplain. In the absence of that functionary, he always on Sundays read a sermon, after which he reviewed the doings of the past week, and gave a short discourse on things in general. "Yet it availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the king's gate," was with him a favorite and so oft-repeated text as to become a byword with cadets.

Our Chaplain from 1814 to 1817 was the Rev. Adam Empie, from North Carolina, a hale and scholarly-looking gentleman, of courteous and winning manner, of polite learning, and respectable eloquence. He, on resigning, became President of William and Mary College, Virginia, and had the misfortune to become totally blind.

During Mr. Empie's time, we had prayers at morning roll-call and on evening parade, and not unfrequently under circumstances but little calculated to inspire devotional feeling. For the purpose of prayers, the wings were thrown forward, and the parade formed into three sides of a square. "The parson," as he was familiarly called, would proceed to the centre, reverently kneel down, sometimes in the snow, and offer up a prayer, the parade meanwhile uncovered. At times, it was fearfully cold, and the prayers were but little heeded, all anxiously awaiting the final Amen!

At reveille roll-call, it would sometimes happen that the parson was caught napping, and the roll-call dismissed just as his reverend head would appear above the hill as he was coming up from his quarters to prayers. This was always considered a triumph by the cadets, and sometimes unmistakably manifested. . . .

As a disciplinarian, Captain Partridge was rigid, but somewhat given to favoritism. In appearance he was naturally austere, and in his manner discovered but little of the suaviter in modo. He was shy and diffident, evidently the result of his ascetic mode of life. He lived in the most unostentatious and frugal manner, and had but few if any associates not connected with his official duties. In his habits he was strictly temperate, and was conspicuous for the moral observances of life. Captain Partridge was never known to be without uniform, and it was believed that he had none other than military clothes. His was that of the Corps of Engineers, with the embroidered collar and cuffs, and the Essayons buttons, — the coat always buttoned up; his appearance was that of a martinet, stiff and precise, undeviatingly so. When without his sword, on general occasions, he carried a small rattan, which, when in conversation, he in a nervous manner constantly applied to his leg. There was something characteristic in his appearance, which those who were familiar with him can never forget. He at times appeared in an ancient uniform coat, with rather more than the then prescribed embroidery, and with unusually wide-spread tails, known to the cadets as the “Peacock,” and which was looked upon as a sort of judicial robe, which, when put on, meant execution of some kind, and which always occasioned a sharp lookout. Captain Partridge was known to the cadets by the sobriquet of “Old Pewter,” — he was universally so called; and when he was seen coming from his “salt-box,” as his diminutive quarters were called, on a tour of inspection to the barracks, the cry would resound, “Old Pewter’s coming!” when every idler would make for his quarters, seize his books and slate, and assume the virtue of study. Sometimes he would come unobserved, and slip noiselessly into the rooms when his presence was least expected or desired, and not unfrequently in the midst of a rollicking set. To be detected in any violation of the Regulations was certain and immediate punishment, and offenders were at once confined to the barracks or guard-house, or indulged with extra hours of guard duty. Fifteen days in the guard-house was no uncommon circumstance, with extra guard ad libitum. Indeed, in 1814–18, there was no limit, within the discretion of the Superintendent, to punishments as described. Courts martial were unknown, and I never knew of any one questioning the right of punishment. Confinement was so common, few escaping, and the offenses very trifling as a general thing, that it was not at all looked upon as a degradation; nor did it constitute demerit, as no class-standing had been then established. It was, however, very detrimental to a proper esprit de corps. The confined were regarded as prisoners, marched under guard to meals, exempt from academic instruction, — in short, in a degree subjected to the discipline of a prison.

I cannot conclude this narrative without particular reference to our good professors of the olden time, Colonel Mansfield, Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, and Major Ellicott, Professor of Mathematics.

Colonel Mansfield was extremely near-sighted, and of such delicate structure as to convey the idea of decrepitude. His manner was very gentle, and as a professor he was by no means rigid. In demonstrations he required the classes to use, in constructing figures on the board, the same letters used in the text-book, little suspecting that it would afford the means of refreshing memory by peeping over his shoulder and reading from the book before him, to which his attention was intently given. Colonel Mansfield was much beloved and respected by the cadets, and deemed an efficient instructor. As an astronomical observer, he was quite renowned, and had been engaged, before coming to the Academy, in extensive surveys of boundary lines.

Major Ellicott, Professor of Mathematics, was the opposite in figure to his philosophical compeer, and would well have personified Falstaff in person. He was very jolly, and had his jokes with the youngsters, who gave him the sobriquet of "Old Infinite Series." His instruction in mathematics was limited, and did not extend beyond Spherical Trigonometry before the coming of Professor Crozet. Major Ellicott was also a good astronomical observer, and had also been engaged in boundary surveys. He was the first postmaster at West Point. In his manner, Professor Ellicott was very precise, and neat in his figures. He always had, I think, attached to his buttonhole, a very small slate, with sponge and pencil, and his figures were of the smallest. He always required the figures on the board to be constructed with mathematical precision, with cord and ruler, and to construct a perfect geometrical figure was, with him, equal to a successful demonstration.

During the years 1814-15, there were at the Point a few soldiers of the olden time, who were privileged characters, and who were fast friends with the cadets, and more or less in their confidence. One of these, "Old Whipple," lived in a small box opposite the west wing of the Yellow Barracks, and was the authorized bootblack. Having served everywhere, he had, by some natural process of events which seem especially provident to old soldiers, brought up at West Point. And Whipple was the right man in the right place; he was the bosom friend of all the youngsters, and no one could drive so good a trade as he in purchasing a barrel of apples or of cider (neither prohibited), the bills of exchange, always at sight, being represented by superfluous old clothing. Whipple was an original, peculiar in phraseology, and abounding in mother-wit, and was, in cadet estimation, the best old fellow in the world.

Another old soldier of credit and renown, who “served when George the Third was King,” I well remember in George Stringfellow. George was the Figaro of the Point, and his wife represented the clothes-washing department. Their respective vocations brought them in close barrack association, and that high military courtesy and deference which the long life of a soldier had conferred on George made him ever a source of amusement and interest. George was a perfect martinet, his appearance always neat and soldier-like, and his observance of military etiquette a part of his existence. To cadets individually, he always observed the respect due to his superiors, and by no possible chance could the battalion be paraded, even on occasions of marching to meals, that George would not, by wonderful instinct, be found in close proximity, standing erect in the attitude of salute until he was passed. Like old soldiers, George would at times take an extra glass, and having a slight natural lisp he was, on such occasions, particularly grand and unintelligible.

During my time at the Point, the best relations of friendship existed among the cadets. Quarreling, fighting, or reporting were of rare occurrence. I remember one duel with pistols between two cadets, growing out of a misunderstanding at the mess table. This came off before breakfast in Washington Garden, under all the rules of the code, and fortunately proved harmless. It was generally known in barracks, but probably not so to the authorities, as no notice was taken of it. On another occasion, two cadets went to Fort Clinton to settle a dispute with loaded muskets, but on arriving on the ground the bully in the case, when brought to the score, backed out. Of course there were occasional pugilistic encounters, as will necessarily happen in the best regulated families, which usually resulted in a closer friendship.

The class of 1818 assumed the name of "Specials," and as the control was with the class to which belonged the greater part of the cadet officers, they could with impunity excuse themselves from roll-calls, marching to meals, and indeed almost all of the duties not academic. "Specials" were never reported, and, although delinquents, were exempt from demerit. A classmate of mine, of the succeeding class, who had been turned back to us, was by his former class made a Special by brevet, and enjoyed all the immunities pertaining thereto. My class fell heir to the above privilege. The whole proceeding of class supremacy was rather arrogant, though not prohibited by the authorities, who could not have been ignorant of the assumed privileges, and perhaps after all it was not detrimental, as primogeniture is quite a natural right as exercised in all colleges.

From 1814 to 1820, cadets were much given to athletic sports, so essentially necessary to manly development in the proper blending of physical and mental training. Football and handy (shindy) were the familiar games, and the Plain the field of action, and the contests generally of the most lively and exciting interest.

Skating was also a favorite amusement both on ponds and river, and although not unfrequently attended with a cold bath, I remember no more serious result than an occasional wet jacket. Swimming, at the proper season, came in for its share, and although the Northern boys were the more expert on the ice, the Southern were more at home in the water. Indeed, both departments were admirably and at all times well represented. And it was a merry sight to witness, not yet faded from my remembrance, — the many youthful and agile figures gliding, with a grace unappreciated by themselves, over the polished surface of the ice, or boldly plunging into the deep waters of the Hudson, and manfully stemming its propulsive current. I remember a cadet from North Carolina, who would have regarded a swim from "Sestos to Abydos" as child's play. He swam with all the assurance of a South Sea Islander, and I have known him to remain in the water off Gee's Point and beyond his depth for fully an hour. His persistency in staying in the water was more or less a source of anxiety to the swimming party, and authority had to be frequently exercised to bring him to terra firma.

In chronicling the amusements and pastimes of my youthful days, I must not omit the occasional ascents of Cro' Nest, and fishing excursions to the lakes so enchantingly nestled on the summit of the West Point range of hills, and so abounding with the finny tribe. And having thus revisited this pinnacle, from which, in the retrospect, such an extensive coup d'œil is brought to light of early recollections and early times, it becomes me to bring to a close this currente calamo narrative of my happy West Point days, —

"When the young blood ran current in my veins,
And boyhood made me sanguine."

CHAPTER III.

PERIOD FROM JULY 28, 1817, TO JULY 1, 1833.

BVT. COLONEL SYLVANUS THAYER, SUPERINTENDENT.

THE ASSOCIATION OF GRADUATES OF THE UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY, with deep feelings of gratitude to the great Superintendent of the Institution from 1817 to 1833, erected a statue to his memory at the southwest angle of the Plain of West Point, which was unveiled on the Fiftieth Anniversary of his retiring from the charge of the Academy of which he has been so justly called "The Father."

The Address, delivered by me on that occasion, gives the essential facts connected with the administration of General Thayer. It is, therefore, here appended as a part of the EARLY HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY.

ADDRESS OF GENERAL CULLUM AT THE UNVEILING OF THE STATUE OF GENERAL THAYER, AT WEST POINT, N. Y., JUNE 11, 1883.

Ladies and Gentlemen, and Fellow-Graduates of the Military Academy:—

This year completes the FIRST CENTURY of our national existence. On the 11th of April, 1783, Congress issued its Proclamation for the cessation of hostilities with the mother country, after eight years of severe struggle and bloody battle.

On that day, the Commander-in-Chief, whose headquarters were then at Newburg, was called upon by Colonel Alexander Hamilton, Chairman of the Committee for Peace Arrangements, to state his views upon a military peace establishment. Though oppressed with weighty cares, and deeply distressed by recent efforts to tempt his own patriotism and to excite mutiny in his starving army, Washington immediately (April 14, 1783) called upon his general officers for their opinions, to enable him to prepare his response, which he soon submitted to Congress in a voluminous and masterly report. One of the prominent features of this able document was to urge the importance of military education, for all knew how much our cause had suffered from the lack of discipline and instruction; how dependent we had been upon foreign soldiers of fortune; and how ignorance had often usurped high commands.

That West Point, in full view of Newburg, where the Continental Army was encamped, should be the chosen location of Washington and many of his officers for a Military School was obvious; for here was the stage upon which had been played the first acts of the nearly consummated tragedy of the Revolution; and this was the key of the magnificent Hudson, the strategic line of operations from the Atlantic to the Canadas, whose loss would have sundered in twain the power of the United Colonies. If further proof were needed, it is to be found in the fact that General Huntington, the trusted friend of Washington, by return of mail (April 16, 1783), answered from West Point his circular, saying that here was the post for the location of "an Academy for instruction in all branches of the military art." Shortly after (April 22, 1783), Colonel Timothy Pickering, Quartermaster-General of the Army, wrote that "it might be expedient to establish a Military School or Academy at West Point." Steuben and other officers advocated the creation of one or more Military Academies at the principal posts of the United States. The most important post at this time was West Point, where, soon after, were deposited our surplus ordnance and military stores.

From the termination of the Revolution, Washington was the earnest advocate of a Military Academy. In his speech to Congress, Dec. 3, 1793, he asks whether, in the Act more effectually to provide for the national defense, "a material feature in our improvement of it ought not to be to afford an opportunity for the study of those branches of the military art which can scarcely ever be attained by practice alone." Upon this recommendation, Congress, in 1794, created the subaltern grade of Cadet, the cadets to be attached to their regiments, and "furnished at the public expense with the necessary books, instruments, and apparatus" for their instruction. This plan of educating young officers at their posts was found impracticable; hence Washington, in his last annual Message, Dec. 7, 1796, again urged, in the most cogent language, the establishment of a Military Academy, where a regular course of instruction in the science of war could be given. "Whatever argument," says he, "may be drawn from particular examples superficially viewed, a thorough examination of the subject will evince that the art of war is at once comprehensive and complicated; that it demands much previous study; and that the possession of it, in its most improved and perfect state, is always of great moment to the security of a nation. This, therefore, ought to be a serious care of every government." After leaving the executive chair, he writes, Dec. 13, 1798, to the Secretary of War, upon the importance of having good engineers and artillerymen, and the impossibility of forming them suddenly where "much previous study and experience are essential."¹ Again, May 13,

1799, he writes to him earnestly upon the same subject, and, just before the opening of the next Congress, Hamilton reiterates like sentiments. "No sound mind," says the latter, "can doubt the essentiality of military science in time of war, any more than the moral certainty that the most pacific policy on the part of a government will not preserve it from being engaged in war more or less frequently. To avoid great evils, it must either have a respectable force prepared for service, or the means of preparing such a force with expedition. The latter, most agreeable to the genius of our Government and nation, is the object of a Military Academy." A copy of this letter was forwarded to Washington, who replies, Dec. 12, 1799, only two days before his death, saying: "I have duly received your letter on the subject of a Military Academy. The establishment of an institution of this kind, upon a respectable and extensive basis, has ever been considered by me as an object of primary importance to this country; and while I was in the chair of Government, I omitted no proper opportunity of recommending it, in my public speeches and other ways, to the attention of the Legislature. . . . I sincerely hope that the subject will meet with due attention, and that the reasons for its establishment, which you have so clearly pointed out in your letter to the Secretary, will prevail upon the Legislature to place it upon a permanent and respectable footing."

This last legacy of the Father of his Country, and the earnest efforts of the patriot soldiers and statesmen of the Revolution, finally effected the cheapest and safest mode of developing and perpetuating military knowledge by the establishment, March 16, 1802, of this Military Academy at West Point, then a school for ten cadets of Engineers and forty of Artillery, and now a world-renowned institution, educating three hundred and forty-four pupils for all branches of service in the Army.

Notwithstanding the claims of Washington and the wise men of 1783 to the paternity of the Military Academy at West Point, we are gravely informed by a writer in the April, 1883, number of the "Magazine of American History," with startling headlines, that General Henry Burbeck was the "Founder of the United States Military Academy"! Over fourscore years have elapsed since this crowning glory of the Commandant of Artillery purports to have been achieved, of which no mention is made in the carefully collated state papers, such early records of the Military Academy as are still extant, or in the writings of so many diligent searchers into the history of West Point. "No printed document," truly says the author of the article, "is to be found which, in the remotest degree, associates Burbeck's name with the inception or establishment" of this institution. The wonderful story has had a Rip Van Winkle sleep of over fourscore years till "the appearance of this sketch" in the "Magazine of American History"! No one will dispute the writer's originality of discovery, not even the shade of "the gallant and modest Burbeck." While in flesh, the kind old General was my near neighbor at New London, Conn., for the ten years preceding his death. I saw him almost daily, and frequently discussed with him the past of the old Army, but never once did his modesty permit the slightest allusion to his being the great "Founder of the Military Academy," though he was never silent upon his claims to other devices. The first intimation of the astounding fact now comes to us from this article, of which certainly the well-informed contemporaries of Burbeck in the old Army were ignorant, or the secret of their prison-house must have leaked out in some word or writing which would have informed the public.

When Jefferson, an enlightened statesman and patron of learning, became the President of the United States, March 4, 1801, he recognized the failure of the attempts to educate young officers at their posts, and the necessity of improving their military training by bringing them together for instruction, as had often been proposed by Washington and others. "Accordingly," says Joseph G. Swift, then a cadet of Artillerists and Engineers, in his diary, "during the summer of 1801, General Dearborn, the Secretary of War, gave notice to our little Army that President Jefferson had directed the establishment of a Military School at West Point for the instruction of cadets, under the law of 1794 and subsequent Acts of Congress."¹ Burbeck, then at the head of a military department, was, of course, the official channel through which these instructions of his superiors were communicated to the regimental cadets, included in his command, to assemble at West Point; but that would no more entitle Burbeck to the claim of being the "Founder of the Military Academy" than the Adjutant-General, through whom come all army orders, would be entitled to be considered the projector of every army operation directed by the Secretary of War and General-in-Chief.

"On the 1st of October," says Swift, then at Fort Wolcott, R. I., "I received a letter from General Dearborn directing me to repair to this school," and "October 15, 1801, I reported myself to the Commandant (of the post of West Point), Lieutenant Osborne, and to Professor Barron" (the head of the Military School), at which time there were present "twelve cadets,"² whose mornings were chiefly taken up in listening to a lecture on elementary mathematics by Barron, and "the afternoons of the day were variously occupied in some brief military exercise, but much more in field sports." Such was this so-called Military School, with one "teacher," nine cadets, and three young lieutenants; and such was the valuable knowledge imparted to its pupils! Yet the "Magazine" writer gravely informs us that "on Sep. 1, 1801, Lieut.-Colonel Tousard¹ having arranged the classes, the course of instruction was regularly begun;" but unfortunately, or perhaps fortunately, all this brave show of "classes" and "instruction" came to nought in a few brief weeks, for in November, Barron was arrested upon a serious charge (which resulted in his dismissal from service), and thereupon the School was suspended till Major Jonathan Williams took command, Dec. 15, 1801. This admirable selection for the Superintendency was not made by Burbeck, but by the President himself, who became acquainted, through Benjamin Franklin, with Williams, in 1784, at Paris; and ever after, Jefferson so highly appreciated his character and talents that, April 1, 1802, he appointed him Chief Engineer, and ex-officio Superintendent of this institution.

² The official record makes the number to be nine. Probably Swift

It was truly fortunate for the Military Academy that its first Superintendent was such a man as Major Jonathan Williams, with the experience of fifty-two years of an eventful life; with the patriot instincts of his Revolutionary sire, and grand-uncle Benjamin Franklin; with a mind liberally educated, and stored with much scientific and general information; with the pen of a ready writer which had done good service in our struggle for independence; with a judgment matured by a mercantile intercourse abroad and high social position at home ; with great decision of character, and untiring zeal in the public service ; and, withal, a most kind and polished gentleman and a brave and chivalric soldier. To such pledges for success in his important command, he added industry, exactness, patience, and benevolence ; hence, under his eminent example, the Academy quickly received tone and character, steadily advanced in discipline and usefulness, and brought forth golden fruit in its distinguished graduates, who did brilliant service in our War of 1812-15 with Great Britain, which began in gloom and disaster, and closed in a blaze of victory. Of the graduates of the Military Academy serving in the field in this contest, one sixth laid down their lives, one fourth were mortally or severely wounded, and one fifth of those who survived received one or two brevets each for their distinguished gallantry in that war.

Unfortunately for the Military Academy, Dr. William Eustis, who had been a hospital surgeon in the Continental Army, was appointed, March 7, 1809, a member of President Madison's Cabinet. He began his administration of the War Department by an effort to disperse the few cadets at the institution, degrade them to common laborers, and deprive them of all educational advantages. By midsummer of 1810, he, by his failure to make new appointments, and by his constant detail of cadets for clerks and for subordinate company duties, had left so few at West Point that the Military Academy, except in name, had virtually ceased to exist ; and discipline was so palsied by his constant intermeddling that only by the most summary measures could Williams preserve even its semblance.

Though Eustis had resigned, and did not vacate his office till his successor was appointed, Jan. 13, 1813, others more enlightened, including the President, foresaw the approaching storm of war. Madison, accordingly, in an able state paper communicated to Congress Dec. 5, 1810, sets forth the usefulness and necessity of a properly organized Military Academy to teach the art of war with little expense to the nation, and without danger to the liberties of the people.

Finally, April 29, 1812, Congress passed a law greatly augmenting the Military Academy; but, Eustis being still Secretary of War, nothing was done to carry out its ample provisions. Instead of enlarging the supply of educated talent to direct the impending struggle, Eustis sought to repeat the fable of trying to destroy the infant Hercules in the cradle.

Not till after the commencement of hostilities with Great Britain had a cadet, under the new law, been sent to the Military Academy. Cadet Charles S. Merchant, who recently died after two thirds of a century's continuous service, reported for duty, Sept. 30, 1812, at West Point, to Capt. Alden Partridge, the only officer present. The Acting Superintendent and the newly arrived "plebe" then constituted the whole of the magnificent Military Academy, which, under the existing law of April 29, 1812, was to consist of two hundred and sixty cadets, one Professor of Engineering, one of Natural Philosophy, and one of Mathematics (each with an Assistant Professor), one Teacher of French and another of Drawing. With such an ample academic staff on paper, and with one cadet in actual possession, we cannot wonder that Captain Partridge, as Acting Superintendent, should have admitted Merchant as a full-fledged cadet, to constitute the entire corps with its four classes, without undergoing any examination into his physical and mental qualifications, or his capacity, as required by law, to be at once "trained and taught all the duties of a private, non-commissioned officer, and officer, and be encamped three months of each year." By Dec. 15, 1812, while the Acting Superintendent, who was an admirable drill-master, was putting Merchant through his facings and teaching him the "goose-step," five other cadets (George W. Gardiner, Nathaniel G. Dana, John S. Allanson, John Munroe, and Isaac A. Adams) dropped in at West Point, the entire six forming the "School of the Company." By this time the Hudson Highlands were covered with snow, and the winter vacation began, for in those days the winters at West Point were considered too severe for the germination of mathematical ideas; hence these ardent aspirants for military glory were furloughed till April 15, 1813, when the Military Academy, with scarce a score of cadets, resumed its existence under the more favorable auspices of the new Secretary of War, the veteran Gen. John Armstrong.

At this time, Gen. Joseph G. Swift had become the Chief Engineer of our Army, and ex-officio Superintendent of the Military Academy; but, the necessities of the existing war requiring his presence in the field, the temporary command of West Point continued under the senior officer present, Capt. Alden Partridge, who proved entirely unequal to the high duties intrusted to him. But during a period of hostilities, and the derangements consequent thereon, the sovereign remedy for existing evils could not at once be applied,—the selection of a suitable Superintendent, competent to lay a broad foundation of scientific instruction, and to direct the administration of the Military Academy in a way to fulfill its high destiny.

Captain Partridge, after a few years' trial, having been found wanting, attention was naturally fixed upon some of our most prominent Engineer officers to take his place. None at that time enjoyed higher reputations for adaptability, as soldiers and scholars, to the important command of the Military Academy, than Colonel McRee and Major Thayer, both of whom were in Europe, ostensibly to examine the French and Netherland fortifications and purchase books to form a library at West Point, though it was doubtless designed that in going abroad they, by the study of the military schools and establishments in Northern Europe, should fit themselves, one or the other, to become the future Superintendent of the Military Academy. The choice fortunately fell upon Major Thayer, who was ordered to return to the United States by May 1, 1817, to take command at West Point, necessity, in the opinion of the President, justifying a departure from the letter of the organic law of 1802, which required the "Principal Engineer, and in his absence the next in rank, to be the Superintendent of the Military Academy."

Captain and Brevet Major Sylvanus Thayer was not thirty-two years of age when he assumed, July 28, 1817, his responsible trust. When a youth of nine years, he became the arbiter of his own fortune, battling with poverty and adversity under which a less resolute boy would have succumbed. Subsequently, sustaining himself by school-teaching, and buoyed up by his innate energy, he found time to master the rudiments of the Latin and Greek languages, and the elements of mathematics, thus enabling him, in September, 1803, to creditably enter Dartmouth College, N. H., where his untiring energy and vigorous intellect soon made their mark, though such men as George Ticknor, the distinguished author, and Joseph Bell, the eminent lawyer, were his class competitors. In his sophomore year he had the second honor, the Greek oration, and in his senior the valedictory was assigned to him; but, having been appointed a cadet, he was compelled to leave college for West Point before Commencement Day. At the Military Academy, he was the most brilliant boy in his class, and in less than a year was graduated, Feb. 23, 1808. From that date till called to the field in 1812, he was actively employed on engineer service; in giving mathematical instruction at West Point, where he was also the Adjutant of the Academy; and upon ordnance duty, there being then scarcely an officer in our Army who knew how to make even a musket cartridge. During the War of 1812-15, he was the Chief Engineer of various forces in the field, and for his "distinguished and meritorious services" was brevetted a major.

Upon the termination of hostilities, he and Colonel McRee were selected to accompany Commodore Decatur's expedition to chastise the Algerine pirates who had been preying upon our commerce in the Mediterranean; but their destination was suddenly changed from Africa to Europe, from which Thayer, as we have before stated, had returned, with his mind richly stored with useful knowledge, to enter upon his new career.

Major Thayer, upon graduating at West Point, had left his Alma Mater under the wise and efficient supervision of Colonel Williams, and upon his return, after the lapse of only nine years, he found the Military Academy in a chaotic condition, without system or regularity in its administration, or harmony among its professors, most of whom were absent or in arrest. The number of cadets belonging to the institution was much below the legal allowance, and these had been admitted at all ages from twelve to thirty-four; some were maimed and others married, and many were totally disqualified for the profession of arms. Preliminary mental and physical examinations had been dispensed with; no classification by merit existed; and graduation from the institution depended more upon vacancies in the Army, age and growth of cadets, and fancied fitness to become officers, than upon any rigid test of attainments. Some, despite the law of 1812, requiring that they should go "through all the classes," became full-fledged officers in four months, and others again not till they had been pupils for nearly six years.

True, the wise regulations of the Academy, approved July 2, 1816, by Secretary Crawford, prescribed a regular course of four years' instruction; but these salutary requirements appear to have been practically ignored, and it could not be otherwise, as, between winter vacations and summer encampments, little or no time was left for study. The veteran Mansfield patiently taught Natural Philosophy from "Enfield;" the still older Ellicott rarely transcended the elementary Mathematics of Hutton's first volume; Crozet had hardly commenced the introduction of Descriptive Geometry and Engineering, as brought by him from the Polytechnic School of France, where he had been educated; Zoeller gave some instruction in the use of steel pen and brush in Drawing, and the employment of surveying instruments in the field; Berard taught only "Duffie's Course of French;" the Chaplain gave no instruction in Geography, History, and Ethics; Chemistry, Mineralogy, and Geology were untaught; Pierre Thomas practiced a little Sword Exercise; and the Commanding Officer gave an occasional lecture on Military History, drilled the cadets as infantry, and confined the artillery instruction to the manual of the piece and some target practice with twelve and eighteen pounders. Up to 1817, nothing was positive in discipline, instruction, or administration, all being conducted by a militia rule rather than upon any fixed military system. As courts martial for the trial of cadets had no existence, they had no dread of punishment beyond the arbitrary awards of the Commandant, and deficiency, or being turned back for neglect of studies, had never occurred; the professors, mostly old men, had little ambition, and were in a state of chronic feud with their superior; and the control of cadets' supplies and the care of public property was mainly in the hands of the relations and protégés of the Acting Superintendent, who gave to them most of the patronage of the Academy.

“Old Pewter,” as Partridge was familiarly called by the cadets, who entertained for him a kind regard, though not a profound respect, was temperate, industrious, exacting, energetic, in his plodding way doing the best he could; but living the ascetic life of a recluse, and knowing little of the world beyond West Point, he continually moved, clad in his antiquated uniform, in the same unvarying treadmill of routine. Like Bottom in the play, he was ready to perform all parts, whether of exercising command, filling a professor’s chair, supplying the pulpit, drilling a squad or battalion, lecturing on grand tactics or moral philosophy, inspecting mess kitchens or barracks, wrangling with bombardier soldiers, or descending to play police spy upon cadets. He seemed to ignore all division of labor; and, zealous to supervise every detail, completely lost sight of the enlarged functions of his high office. That he was incapable of directing a great institution of learning was not only then evident, but was subsequently proved by the entire failure of his many private military schools. Worse than all, some years after leaving the Army, in a vituperative document addressed to Congress, the President, and the country, under the signature of Americus, he malignantly aspersed the motives and characters of honorable men, and raised his hand to destroy, if possible, the institution from which he had been graduated, and over which he had had the distinguished honor of presiding.

The officer relieved, and his successor in command of the Military Academy, were the very antipodes of each other, and both stamped the institution with their respective characters. Partridge was ungainly in person and uncouth in manner, Thayer of heroic mould and of stately dignity ; the one a martinet drill-master and contracted pedant, the other a scientific soldier and erudite scholar ; the former partial and severe by turns, the latter uniform and just in discipline ; the one controlling by temporary expedients, the other administering authority with enlightened wisdom ; the former everywhere present and general factotum, the latter an unseen governor steadily regulating a complex machine ; and while the one with restless activity accomplished little, the other, buried in his study, worked out with cool composure the great problem of military education.

The change from darkness to sunlight at West Point was magical. The Academy, which had nodded through several years of comparative stagnation, was suddenly metamorphosed from a drowsy school of supine students to the precocious nonage of a great seminary of science and military art. The wand of the new Carnot waved over all, educing strength and symmetry from atony and chaos. With heart, soul, and resolution, giving himself no rest, and utilizing all within his control, he boldly and undismayed entered upon his Augean labors of educational reformation. With good habits and vigorous health, he was able to endure excessive exertion ; an ardent nature intensified his zeal in the performance of duty ; system and study taught him what to do, and how to do it ; his iron will overcame all opposition, and brooked nothing not tributary to his success ; and a vaulting ambition overleaped all impediments in the path to his purpose, which was to create a military educational institution worthy of a great people, and unsurpassed in the nations of the Old World.

Major Thayer, upon assuming the Superintendency, found himself virtually without a command, the cadets of the Military Academy being mysteriously dispersed to all parts of the country on furloughs. As no record of their abodes was to be found at West Point, resort was had to the newspapers to advertise for their return, which was very irregular. Some never came back, and hence, by order of the President, were dismissed on the first of the following March.

Hardly had Major Thayer secured a nucleus of his command, and become deeply absorbed in meditating the initiatory steps to begin his administration systematically, when a new interruption confronted him. Captain Partridge, on the 29th day of August, contrary to the meaning and intent of the orders he had received, returned to West Point, and on the next day, because he was not put in possession of certain quarters which he coveted (called the "salt box" by the cadets), assumed command of the Military Academy. "This unauthorized act," says the Chief Engineer in his official communication, "together with the unmilitary and disorderly manner in which it has been effected, has the Brigadier-General's strongest censure." In consequence of this unwarranted proceeding, Captain Partridge was immediately arrested, and ordered to leave West Point without delay. Major Thayer resumed the Superintendency Sep. 5, 1817, when the Academy began that successful ascent which, in the succeeding sixteen years, culminated in such notable perfection of the institution.

Subsequently, Oct. 20, 1817, Captain Partridge was arraigned before a court martial, Major-General Winfield Scott being the president, and was sentenced to be cashiered, but, in consideration of the Captain's "zeal and perseverance in the discharge of his professional duties," he was recommended to the President's clemency, who remitted the sentence, as advised by the Chief Engineer, "provided Captain Partridge would resign," which he did, April 15, 1818.

As before stated, the regulations of the Military Academy of July 2, 1816, seem never to have been operative. The great work of purification did not practically begin till the return of Major Thayer to command. His military experience in the field, his foreign travel and associations, his familiarity with the polite usages of society, his dignified bearing and refined mode of life, and, above all, his scientific acquirements, enlarged professional reading, and familiarity with the French and dead languages, gave him immense vantage-ground for success. Almost by intuition, he discovered the virulent ulcers destroying the vital parts of the Academy, and such as he could not cauterize into healing action, like a bold surgeon, he promptly extirpated. Examinations were at once held, the incompetent and vicious dismissed, and the indolent, who had lingered for many years without progress, quickly discovered that a like fate awaited a continuance of their dereliction. He promptly organized the cadets into a battalion of two companies, officered by members of their own body, with a colonel at its head and an adjutant and sergeant-major for his staff; appointed an officer of the Army as "Commandant of Cadets," responsible for their tactical instruction and soldierly discipline; transacted business with members of his command only at stated office hours; classified all cadets according to their proficiency in studies; divided classes into small sections for more thorough instruction by the teachers in charge; required weekly class reports showing the daily progress of students according to a scale of marks; directed more thorough recitations, and a freer use of the blackboard; greatly improved the curriculum of studies, according to a well-digested programme; organized a proper Academic Board, with the Superintendent at its head; introduced the check-book system, to curtail the prevailing extravagance of cadets, then deeply in debt; reduced the expenses of educating pupils to less than one half the cost at the Woolwich Military Academy in England; had the Officer of the Day daily to dine with him, enabling himself thereby to learn all that was transpiring in camp or barracks; required cadets to obtain a permit from him for almost everything, even to a letter from the post-office, thus maintaining such constant intercourse as enabled him to call all by name, and understand their characters and habits; and made many other salutary provisions to secure thorough discipline, a high standard of honor, complete physical and mental development, and a generous rivalry for conspicuous soldiership and eminent class rank. The more thoroughly to guarantee the latter, the Secretary of War directed, Feb. 14, 1818, the publishing in the Army Register of the names of the five cadets of each class most distinguished for attainments and meritorious conduct. Soon after, April 14, 1818, the Professorship of Geography, History, and Ethics was established, thus adding new and important elements in the education of cadets.

These successive advances, which so marvelously elevated the tone and character of the Military Academy in less than a year, are best exemplified by the first regulations under Major Thayer's Superintendency, approved July 23, 1818, by that enlightened Secretary of War, John C. Calhoun. These regulations provided for a January and a June examination in each year; required new cadets to report at West Point before the 25th of June, and prohibited examinations for admissions after September 1st, unless candidates were prevented by sickness from reporting sooner; established an annual encampment in July and August in lieu of vacations, which were abolished; granted furloughs for two months after the June examination, provided that not more than one fourth of the Corps of Cadets were absent at one time; allowed only those to be graduated who had gone through the exercises of two entire encampments; stopped the pay of all failing to return at the expiration of their furloughs, and dismissed them from the service; made a diploma the evidence of having completed the full course of studies; attached to the Army Register the names of the five most distinguished of each class reported at the preceding June examination; secured promotion to the grade of commissioned officer according to "general merit," as established upon graduation; admitted aptitude for the several arms of service to be considered, provided it did not interfere with the order of class rank; declared a cadet suspended for any cause from the Academy ineligible to a commission in the Army till his entire class had been promoted; and, finally, forbade that any deficient or dismissed cadet should be appointed "to any office or post in the Army of the United States until at least five years after the promotion of the class to which he had belonged."

The day after the adoption of these salutary safeguards for the discipline, instruction, honor, and rights of the military service, the first class in the order of scholarly attainments and meritorious conduct was graduated from the Academy. Prominent in this class of 1818 were Richard Delafield, for twelve years the Superintendent of this institution; Andrew Talcott, an eminent scientist, who passed away at the advanced age of eighty-seven; Horace Webster, late President of the College of New York; Samuel Ringgold, Harvey Brown, and Samuel Mackenzie, excellent officers of artillery, the former killed at the battle of Palo Alto in the Mexican War; John J. Jackson, of Virginia, who dared to be loyal to the flag under which he was educated, even at the expense of expulsion from the Secession Convention of his native State; Hartman Bache, the high-toned soldier and veteran engineer; and other gallant officers and worthy gentlemen whose names are well known in Army annals.

With each revolving year of Colonel Thayer's Superintendency, class after class was graduated, adding to our Army 570 officers, of whom the nation may be justly proud, for in that galaxy are many bright particular stars which have given lustre to our arms, illuminated the paths of science, brightened halls of learning, and adorned various vocations of usefulness.

In this brief address, it would be impossible to record each prominent event in Thayer's management, and to descant upon the multiform meliorations introduced by him during the sixteen years of his masterly administration, wherein he built up the Military Academy from an elementary school to a model seminary of science and soldiership, worthy of a great people. In these sixteen years, mathematics, from Hutton's Elements, had advanced to a complete course of algebra, geometry, plane and spherical trigonometry, descriptive geometry (including shades, shadows, and perspective), surveying and the use of instruments in the field, analytical geometry, and differential and integral calculus; from a little smattering of French, taught to a few in 1817, some in 1833 became sufficiently proficient to speak the language, most to read it fluently, and all to translate readily scientific text-books and professional works; drawing, confined mostly to copying a few traces of fortifications and a slight use of the brush, had progressed to the delineation of the human figure, pen and pencil landscapes, and topography in all styles of representation; natural and experimental philosophy, from what is to be found in Enfield, had grown to an extended course in physics, dynamics, hydrostatics, hydrodynamics, magnetism, electro-magnetism, optics, and astronomy, embracing their principles, phenomena, and use of the various instruments; chemistry, mineralogy, and geology, in all their branches, had been introduced in 1820; artillery, from a few elements given in a small treatise, with a little target practice and the manual of the piece, had expanded to the theory and practice of gunnery, the fabrication of pyrotechnics required for all the purposes of war, and the manœuvres of pieces and foot batteries; grammar, rhetoric, geography, history, moral philosophy, and constitutional and international law had been added in 1818 to the duties of the Chaplain; engineering, just beginning to be taught as in the Polytechnic School of France, had been enlarged to the broad basis upon which it was built subsequently, the admirable course of field and permanent fortifications, the science of war, architecture, stereotomy, and civil engineering in all of its branches; infantry tactics, confined chiefly to elementary drills in 1817, comprised in 1833 the theory and practice of all movements, from the school of the soldier to evolutions of the line, including the exercises of light infantry and riflemen; military police in camp and barracks was carried out to the full extent required by Army regulations; numerous summer marches had been made, extending even as far as Boston, but were abolished after 1822, that hospitable city having proved a Capua to the cadet Hannibals;¹ the hours for study, recitation, exercises, recreation, and sleep had been judiciously adjusted to produce the maximum instruction and minimum injury to health ; rigorous and just discipline and healthy moral tone had been firmly established ; cheerful obedience to orders and harmony and good will prevailed ; the power of courts martial to try cadets had been affirmed in 1819 by the Attorney-General and President ; all degrading punishments had been abolished, and those of a strictly military type substituted ; the dissipated, idle, vicious, and incompetent were eliminated from the institution ; effete professors had been replaced by the brightest instructors who had been graduated at the Academy ; a new hospital had been erected for the accommodation of the sick, and malingery was checked ; the library, from a few miscellaneous volumes, had grown to embrace a large and valuable collection of scientific, military, and standard works ; models, instruments, and apparatus had been supplied for instruction in the various departments ; a Board of Visitors annually attended the June examination, and reported upon the condition of the Academy ; cadet appointments were distributed according to population ; the hotel had been erected for the accommodation of official visitors and relatives of cadets, but not to subserve the purposes of a fashionable watering-place ; many buildings for the accommodation of officers and for the other uses of the Academy had been built ; adjacent land had been purchased to enlarge the post, and remove the " Gridley Tavern " nuisance ; a military band of great excellence had been created, led by Willis's famous Kent bugle ; shade trees academic staff, many well-informed youths to fill the vacancies which occur in the several corps in the Army ; while others, who retire to private life, carry with them such attainments as, under the right reserved to the several States to appoint the officers and to train the militia, will enable them, by affording a wider field for selection, to promote the great object of the power vested in Congress of providing for the organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia."

had been planted, and many embellishments made to the grounds of West Point; and above all, there had been inculcated sentiments of high honor, strict integrity, ardent patriotism, obedience to command, fidelity to duty, laudable ambition, professional pride, refined courtesy, kindness to juniors, reverence for seniors, and the various accessories which make up the true gentleman and chivalric soldier.

Colonel Thayer, in the sixteen years of his successful administration, had gathered around him an able body of skilled officers, who materially aided him in his herculean task, — Professors Douglass, Davies, and Courtenay, who had developed the analytical sciences, the true groundwork of military education; Torrey, Hopkins, and Mather, who had made the course of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology; Crozet and Mahan, who had skillfully applied all these branches to military and civil engineering and the science of war; McIlvaine and Warner, who had given their culture and eminent abilities to the teaching of ethics and law; the haughty Worth and the scholarly Hitchcock, who had impressed discipline and tone in their daily control of cadets; an able body of assistant professors, selected from the fittest of their classes, who efficiently aided their chiefs; and the soldierly members of his military staff, who had essentially lessened his burden of endless details. But the directing mind was the great Superintendent himself, a ripe scholar, acquainted with every science taught, passionately fond of military literature, and singularly gifted for his elevated command. To the discharge of his important functions he brought eminent personal qualifications, uniting decision with courtesy, authority with kindness, knowledge with consideration for ignorance, strict discipline with paternal admonition, unflinching integrity to unflinching firmness, fidelity to his trust, and loyalty to his country, and with a restless energy and an untiring industry that never left anything unfinished or to chance. With such qualities and accomplishments, it is not surprising that the Academy, which he found weak, imperfectly organized, low in prerequisites, and inferior in its course of training, should be raised, by his knowledge of its wants and devotion to its interests, to be the paragon of educational institutions in this country, and, judged by its fruits, not surpassed in the nations of the Old World.

Colonel Thayer fortunately had entered upon his command almost simultaneously with Secretary Calhoun's succession to the War Department. Both were in the prime of vigorous manhood, and possessed many of the same strong salient points of mind and character, — decision, firmness, analytical power, organizing capacity, knowledge of agents, skill to control, high aspirations, purity of purpose, stainless honor, enlarged views, and towering ambition. They soon became fast friends, and entertained mutual respect for each other's character and motives. Under these fortuitous circumstances, Thayer, for the first eight critical years of his superintendency, had Calhoun's unswerving support, and unbounded confidence in his appointed mission of leading the Academy from a dreary wilderness into a land of promise. For the four succeeding years, during President John Quincy Adams's administration, the same trust was reposed by Secretaries Barbour and Porter in Colonel Thayer's good government.

Commendations, official and unofficial, of Thayer's superintendence, came from all quarters. Daniel Webster, in a private letter, says: "I congratulate you on the continued success and growing respectability of the institution under your care, and the universal sentiment, so favorable to your character and merits, in regard to the manner in which you conduct the seminary." President Jackson's Attorney-General, B. F. Butler, in a public address, affirms that "it was during the superintendence of that exact disciplinarian, whose praise is on every military lip, that the Academy emerged from comparative obscurity, and took, in its appropriate sciences, the first place among our public institutions." General Scott, as early as 1826, strongly recommended Thayer to be brevetted a Colonel, "for the highest development and effect" given to the Military Academy, to which "for more than eight years he had devoted his great attainments, and the most unwearied zeal and application to its duties. It is believed that he has at length given to the School an excellence equal to the most celebrated in the world." Many other commendations, equally flattering, could be added, but these will suffice.¹

Thayer, at the end of President Adams's administration, expresses, in a letter to General Swift, a desire to leave West Point, because "of a sense of filial duty to an aged mother," and to be placed at another post nearer to her; but, he adds, "an officer has not the privilege of selecting the service which he will perform." Though strongly impresssd with this military sentiment, it is not impossible that his clear vision saw the shadows of coming events.

For twelve years Colonel Thayer had held a sway at West Point which had never been disputed, even by the Executive, when, in 1829, General Andrew Jackson, a man of iron, became President of the United States, and John H. Eaton, a man of putty in the hands of his moulder, his Secretary of War. Though the existing relations between Jackson and Thayer were amicable, it was inevitable that there would soon be a collision between these two positive men respecting the control of the Military Academy. Thayer, while knowing his duties as a subordinate, knew also his right to the cordial support of the higher powers in carrying out his legitimate measures. Hence he pursued the even tenor of his way, though not unmindful of what Jefferson said when Monroe had proposed to appoint Jackson Minister to Russia: "Why, good God! he would breed you a quarrel before he had been there a month."

A month, however, passed after the President's inauguration, and the sky was all serene; but soon a little cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, began to gather at Washington. As usual, cadets were tried by courts martial at West Point, and their sentences of dismissal sanctioned by the Secretary of War; but, after the lapse of a few short weeks, they would return with an order that they were reinstated by the President. Cadets discharged for deficiency in their studies were also restored. Thayer bore these blows at the vital discipline of the Academy as patiently as possible, but when they were again and again repeated, it may well be imagined that the equanimity of the imperious Colonel was not a little disturbed, though smothered from a high sense of subordination. The antagonistic attitude of the President soon ripened into actual hostility, much through the influence of an official personage who was an intimate visitor at the White House. For a very grave offense, he had, years before, been dismissed from the Military Academy when about graduating high in his class. Being a man of ability and resolution, and determined to have his revenge, he left no stone unturned to prejudice the President against the supposed author of his woes; and, alas for the weakness of poor human nature! others were at hand who, to avenge fancied wrongs, turned against their old commander.

Governor Lewis Cass, in 1831, became Secretary of War, — a man of enlightened views, of much learning, of excellent abilities, and of a kindly nature disposing him to do right; but the courage of his convictions capitulated when the great Jupiter from his Olympian height nodded the signal for surrender. Consequently, things went on as formerly. Leaves of absence to cadets were extended at the War Department without consulting the Superintendent of the Academy, and those dismissed were reinstated as of yore. The last straw to break the camel's back came when a cadet, an old offender, pardoned and restored to West Point, erected a hickory pole in front of the barracks as the signal of his triumph over authority.

Finally, finding no support at Washington, and that the arbitrary will of the President was to override all law and regulation, Thayer ceased to ask for details for courts martial; and hence, when the next serious breach of discipline occurred, the case, without comment, was reported to the War Department, by which the offending cadet was summarily dismissed, as much to the astonishment of Colonel Thayer as to the cadet himself. Immediately the latter proceeded to Washington, laid the case before the President, who pardoned his offense and restored him to his class, with which he graduated creditably, became a conspicuous soldier, and gallantly laid down his life in the Mexican War at the assault of Churubusco.

Thayer, worn out by the irrepressible conflict of authority, saw that he had become a mere automaton of power at West Point, and felt that he could no longer, under the existing régime, be of service to the institution which he had raised to its present excellence, and that he could not continue to be a target for the shafts which were daily destroying his prerogative.

Before, however, asking to be relieved of his command, he wrote a temperate private letter to the Secretary of War, in which he says: "I am led to believe that there is something at this institution which does not altogether meet with the President's approbation, but I am at a loss to conjecture whether the dissatisfaction, if such really exists, relates to persons or things. If it be the former, I need not point out the proper remedy, and have only to say that I have nothing to ask or to deprecate with respect to myself. Fourteen successive annual Boards of Visitors have been sent to attend the general examinations, and to inquire into the administration of the institution. Many of the members of these boards were known to come here with strong prepossessions against the institution. Others were also known to be confidential friends of President Jackson. All will, I am sure, do me the justice to acknowledge that I afforded every possible facility for their investigations, and that they had access to all sources of information on the spot. Besides these annual visitations, frequent inspections by high officials of the Government have been made. Has a single abuse or act of maladministration during these fourteen years been presented to the notice of the Government by either of the authorities I have named? If so, I am utterly ignorant of it. I am certain that the President is too just and generous to pass sentence of condemnation on any one without a hearing, or to have formed unfavorable opinions respecting the administration of the Academy from information derived from interested and prejudiced sources. . . . Some persons, I am told, are of the opinion that the Regulations are too rigid." He then goes on to examine their merits and application to cadets, and remarks that, if they be not suitable, it is the President's duty to change them, and proposes that he should convene a board "of not less than three discreet persons, having the entire confidence of the Executive, to be sent to West Point to examine and discuss the whole matter, and report their opinions." He concludes by saying "that any regulations, however perfect in themselves, or however well administered by the authorities here, are incapable of producing the desired result so long as the impression continues (and I assume the impression is deep and general) that they do not meet with the full approbation of the Executive, or while it is believed that a dismissed cadet can get reinstated, whether by the influence of powerful friends or by direct and personal application to the President."

It is a remarkable coincidence that, the very day on which this letter was mailed to the Secretary, an order was issued by him convening at West Point a court martial, consisting of thirteen distinguished officers of high rank, ostensibly for the trial of some cadets. Had it not some ulterior purpose, as was then surmised? What the Executive's design may have been must remain a profound mystery; but it is a significant fact that the great court, which solemnly sat upon a few cases of cadet delinquencies, adjourned, having, like the mountain, labored and brought forth a mouse.

That Thayer's letter opened some eyes at Washington seems more than probable, for, just a month after its date and the notable court martial had been dissolved, the Secretary of War replied in the kindest and warmest terms, assuring Thayer that "there is not, in the mind of the President, the slightest shade of unkindly feeling toward you. I speak to you with the utmost candor, and I say that I do know. He has great respect for you, and he has expressed it to me many times." He then goes on to discuss his and the President's views of the character and effect of the Regulations of the Academy. "But these impressions," he adds, "when strongest, were not associated with the least doubt of your conduct and capacity, and, in justice to myself, I may add of your peculiar fitness for the very arduous and responsible office you hold. . . . The state of affairs at the Academy is good. The temporary difficulties have disappeared, and I imagine when they existed they were greatly overrated. Dismiss the whole subject from your mind."

These soft words did not entirely dispel Thayer's misgivings respecting his own future or that of the institution. Accordingly, Jan. 19, 1833, he tendered his resignation as Superintendent of the Military Academy. The Secretary of War reluctantly, March 14, 1833, informed him, through the Inspector of the Academy, that his wishes had been acceded to, and that he would be relieved upon the termination of the June examination.

The Chief Engineer, in concluding his letter, says: "In thus communicating to you the consent of the Secretary of War to your separation from the Academy, I am directed by him to say to you, that the very able and efficient manner in which you have discharged the arduous duties of its superintendence, and conducted its affairs generally, is duly appreciated and meets with his approbation; in which favorable sentiment this department fully concurs."

At this June examination of 1833, the last class under Thayer's administration was graduated just half a century ago. It was my own, called the Carroll Class, after Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, the last survivor of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. Our class entered the Academy one hundred and thirty strong, of whom fifty-six were graduated, forty-three with the class of 1833, and thirteen subsequently. Of the graduates, about one half continued to do good service in the Army, and the other half resigned to fill various spheres of usefulness in civil life; nine fell upon the battle-field; and now only half a score remain of those who, fifty years since, doffed the gray for the blue. To those of this rear-guard of worthy veterans, some of whom it gladdens my heart to see before me on this interesting occasion, I am proud to say they are, though a small, yet a precious, remnant of the class, often pronounced by the great Superintendent the best in general abilities, in his opinion, of any that ever was graduated from this institution.

Never can I forget our happy graduation day. There was no sleep for me after reveille that morning. Soon after, upon looking out of my window, I saw the majestic Thayer taking his early walk. He always rose at five, at which hour his servant never forgot to call him, though he sometimes did forget whether he wore his own or his master's boots and other habiliments, an offense readily condoned because of his punctuality in sounding the five o'clock call. On that graduation morning, as soon as I could swallow my breakfast, I called to bid farewell to the great Jove seated on his armchair throne in the basement of the Superintendent's quarters. Years afterwards, when I occupied the same house, I could never enter that humble apartment without reverently taking off my cap out of respect for the memory of my venerated predecessor.

Since 1833, fifty classes have left these academic halls, swelling the number of graduates of the institution to nearly three thousand. These have filled every arm of the military service with talent, efficiency, and integrity; have materially aided in successfully conducting three great wars, by the first of which American rights were asserted, by the second the national domain extended, and by the last the Union preserved; have perpetually pushed the wild savage from our borders, and been the pioneers of advancing civilization; have constructed and armed our fortifications, improved our harbors and rivers, defined our boundaries, surveyed our inland seas, lighted our extensive coasts, and explored the length and breadth of our land; have given to our militia and volunteers large numbers of valuable officers, and to our colleges able presidents and professors; have furnished distinguished civil engineers, who have bound our territory together with a network of roads and canals; have supplied valuable City, State, and Government functionaries; have improved our workshops and the culture of the soil; have added their mite to the counting-house, the bar, and the pulpit; and, by their contributions to knowledge and the writing of text-books, have greatly elevated the scientific standard of most of our educational institutions.

To this catalogue of the services of the élèves of the Military Academy, it may be added that, though of our generals during the Rebellion only a little more than a third were graduated here, yet most of our great armies and a large majority of our army corps were commanded by them; that, of those promoted to major-generals, two thirds were from the Military Academy; and that, upon the re-organization of the Army in 1866, after the termination of the war, of the sixteen holding commissions of general officers, — the prizes of eminent services, — all were graduates of this institution, except the gallant and accomplished Terry, of whom the Army is justly proud.

Another important feature of the Military Academy is the integrity of its graduates, as proved by the fact that less than two per cent. of their entire number have been cashiered or dismissed from the Army, and nearly all of these for dissipation, or purely military offenses, such as disobedience of orders, absence without leave, etc., involving no taint of dishonesty. In the seventeen years since the re-organization of the Army in 1866, but eleven graduates have been dismissed, while two hundred and twenty-five of those not educated here have been compelled to leave the army, or, taking the ratio of numbers in service, the dismissals of non-graduates have been ten times as great as those of graduates of the Academy.

Addressing the Army of the Potomac some years since, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher said: "This nation is indebted to the West Point Military Academy for as noble a band of graduates as the world can produce. The standard of honor is nowhere higher. Respect and reverence for law and liberty are nowhere more profound. Scrupulous fidelity to duty is nowhere more nearly a religion, and the honor of honesty, the honor of honesty, THE HONOR OF HONESTY, is nowhere so signally illustrated as in the graduates of the West Point Military Academy."

With these striking facts before us, showing the excellence of the Military Academy, matured for years by the wisdom and fostering care of those who have shaped its destiny, it is certainly due to the institution, which has been so severely tested in the crucible of peace and war, that our countrymen should feel that its past is a guarantee of its future usefulness, and that it should be prized as one of the precious jewels in the rich regalia of the nation.

But we must return from this attractive digression to our proper theme.

The peerless Superintendent was relieved, July 1, 1833, from command of the Military Academy, which, in the sixteen years of his devoted administration, had grown from a badly conducted rudimentary school to become a preëminent seminary of science, an enduring monument of his fame, a fostering mother to the whole Army, the cynosure of all educational institutions throughout the land, and a priceless possession for the nation's security and glory. Such laurels had Thayer won by his masterly skill and efficiency that, five years later, when his successor was relieved from duty at West Point, he was invited by Mr. Poinsett, then Secretary of War under President Van Buren, to resume with almost absolute powers the charge of the Military Academy. The unfortunate appointment at the time of a Chaplain little suited to secure the moral discipline of cadets frustrated the whole scheme.

Upon leaving West Point, Thayer was made a member of the Board of Engineers, and was also charged with the planning and building of the fortifications and other public works in and about Boston Harbor, which, as erected by him, will endure for ages as models of engineering skill, and standards of economy and stability of construction. These arduous labors, to which he gave his whole time, except while absent sick in Europe, occupied him for thirty years, when, June 1, 1863, age and feeble health terminated his active military career of more than half a century of unsurpassed usefulness and faithful service. The day before his retirement, he was brevetted Brigadier-General for "long and faithful service."

In his retirement in his humble and almost hermit home at Braintree, Mass., near where he was born, I usually visited him, at least once a year, to enjoy his instructive and genial conversation. He was to me no longer a chip of an iceberg, as I had imagined while a cadet under him, but a warm friend, who received me with cordiality, and easily entered into discussion of the various topics of the day, especially military matters at home and abroad. Sometimes he would talk of his early career, particularly of his disappointment in not reaching Europe in time to participate in the Waterloo campaign of 1815, though, after Napoleon's defeat, he was somewhat compensated by witnessing the daily evolutions and reviews of the allied armies. But his chief delight was to dwell upon the Military Academy and the triumphs of its graduates, with each of whose history and character he was nearly as familiar as if they had been his own children. Notwithstanding his love for the Military Academy was so ardent, it was very difficult to get him to write out any of the details of its history, with which he was so familiar. For many years I pertinaciously plied him with questions, but his dislike to writing was so great that I never succeeded in obtaining a tenth of the information I desired, yet our correspondence would fill volumes. The last letter he ever wrote, found unfinished among his papers, was to myself.

On the 7th of September, 1872, at Braintree, Mass.,

“Of no distemper, of no blast he died,
But fell like autumn fruit that mellow'd long;
Even wonder'd at, because he dropt no sooner.
Fate seem'd to wind him up for fourscore years;
Yet freshly ran he on seven winters more;
Till, like a clock worn out with eating time,
The wheels of weary life at last stood still.”

His remains were followed to the grave by a large number of officers of the Army, some of the Navy, most of his neighbors, and many distinguished friends. To his parent earth, in the old cemetery of Braintree, were bequeathed his mortal remains; but like the sacred relics which

“In Santa Croce's holy precincts lie, Ashes which make it holier, dust which is Even in itself an immortality,” so the Military Academy demanded the earthly tenement of the master mind of its great “Father,” whose magic wand had transformed a torpid chrysalis into this living form of energy, beauty, and excellence.

After five years of continuous effort, he who now addresses you accomplished his heart's desire of securing the consent of the surviving relatives to the removal to West Point of the body of General Thayer, which was here re-interred, Nov. 8, 1877, with the most solemn and imposing military honors. The pall-bearers were the eight senior graduates present, the eldest two having been cadets when the deceased took command of this institution, and the junior two being of the last class which graduated under him. They were as follows, viz. :—

Bvt. Brigadier-General Henry Brewerton, Class of 1819.

Brigadier-General Daniel Tyler, Class of 1819.

Benjamin H. Wright, Class of 1822.

Alexander J. Center, Class of 1827.

Professor Albert E. Church, Class of 1828.

Bvt. Major-Gen. Andrew A. Humphreys, Class of 1831.

Bvt. Major-Gen. John G. Barnard, Class of 1833.

Bvt. Major-Gen. George W. Cullum, Class of 1833.

The remains were placed upon a gun-carriage, tastefully draped with national flags; the engineer castle, surmounted with the letter T on either side; and the chapeau and sword upon the coffin. A led charger, clad in black, followed the gun-carriage.

The military escort, preceded by the band, was composed of the battalion of cadets, a battery of light artillery, and detachment of cavalry.

Following as mourners were a numerous body of graduates of the Academy, and a large concourse of citizens closed the procession. Among the graduates present were five of the seven surviving superintendents of the Academy, — Generals Brewerton, Barnard, Tower, Cullum, and Schofield.

After the remains were committed to the earth by the Chaplain of the Academy, according to the beautiful burial service of the Episcopal Church, General Tyler stepped to the open grave, and with deep emotion pronounced a eulogy upon the virtues and eminent services of the deceased.

The Corps of Cadets then fired three volleys over the confined dust, and the historic Highlands echoed back the last farewell to the great Superintendent, soldier, and scholar, who had hung his wreath of bays, fifty years before, beneath their rocky brows.

Upon the conclusion of the address, those present marched to the monument, situated in the southwest angle of the Plain of West Point, in the following order:—

1. Battalion of Cadets, preceded by the Military Academy Band.
2. Orator of the Day, and Superintendent of the Military Academy.
3. Relatives of the late General Thayer.
4. The Secretary of War, and General-in-Chief U. S. Army.
5. The Board of Visitors to the Military Academy, and General Terry.
6. Graduates of the Military Academy and Officers of the Army. (Graduates according to classes, — Officers of the Army, according to their entry into service.)
7. Invited guests, etc.

After music by the band at the monument, General Cullum presented the statue to the Military Academy in a brief address, as follows:—

To Colonel Thayer, who has achieved so much for military science and the glory of his country; who was always true to himself and to his trust; and who with pride could point to the graduates of this Academy as the jewels and adornments of his administration, as did the noble Cornelia to her Gracchi sons, — to him, the matchless Superintendent of this famous seminary, we come this day to offer in memoriam a similitude of his living self. The sculptor's skill has fashioned it out of the enduring granite of Thayer's own New England, the land he loved so well, and for which he denied himself every luxury that he might leave rich legacies to educate¹ its youth to imitate his example of evolution from small beginnings to achievements which will live forever.

May this monument, reared in loving gratitude to the 'Father of the Military Academy,' on this historic Plain of West Point, ever stimulate the élèves here educated to win a like recognition for merit and patriotism! Where it stands oft stood the Father of his Country, and here, on the memorable morn of Sep. 25, 1780, his awakened suspicions first realized the preservation of this sacred spot from the traitor's grasp. With such mementos of the past, here in the future should ever germinate the soldierly virtues of a Washington and the earnest execrations of an Arnold.

After the lapse of a century since the germinal thought of the illustrious leader of our Revolutionary armies brought this institution into existence, and on this semi-centennial of the retirement from command of him who gave it such renown, it is now my agreeable duty, on behalf of the contributors to this monument, to present it to the Military Academy. I feel assured that its present and all of its future superintendents will guard it with care; and I trust they may never look upon this statue, the counterpart presentment of their distinguished predecessor, without a quickening impulse to follow in his footsteps.

The statue was then unveiled by the sculptor, Carl

¹ General Thayer, by his will and otherwise, gave over four hundred thousand dollars for educational purposes, viz.: about $300,000 for the erection and endowment of an Academy at Braintree, Mass.; over $70,000 to Dartmouth College, N. H., for endowing a School of Civil Engineering, a Mathematical Prize Fund, and towards providing a fire-proof Library; and $32,000 for the building and book fund of the Braintree, Mass., Library.

Conrads, and, after music by the band, was saluted by the Corps of Cadets presenting arms and eleven guns fired from the battery. General Merritt, Superintendent of the Military Academy, then accepted the statue in the following words:—

GENERAL CULLUM:—It is my pleasing duty to accept, in behalf of the Military Academy, this magnificent statue of General Thayer. In the name of the Academy, I thank you most heartily. I need scarcely assure you, sir, for the authorities now here, or who are to come, that such care and respect shall be shown this monument as are due to the character and services of the illustrious soldier whom you have so justly styled ‘The Father of the Military Academy.’”

The exercises were then concluded by the Chaplain of the Military Academy, who pronounced the benediction.

AFTER HISTORY.

In the foregoing History we have sketched the struggles of the Military Academy through the first thirty-one years of its existence, during which, from a small beginning, it became a noted military and scientific seminary. At the end of this period (1833), General Thayer, its justly named “Father,” after an able administration of sixteen years, left it a perfected institution, which in tone and character has endured essentially the same up to this day. With the advance of science and military experience since 1833, learned professors have not only maintained but improved its course of instruction, to conform to the requirements of the present age. New apparatus has also been added; the library has been much enlarged; numerous capacious buildings have been erected; and many improvements have been made for the comfort and convenience of officers and cadets; while the general direction of the entire affairs of the Military Academy and post of West Point has been efficiently conducted by the following Superintendents : —
